A. D. 1695. THE enemies of the government ungenerouſly took advantage of the death of queen Mary for diſtreſſing their country. The earl of Rocheſter propoſed a doubt in the houſe of lords with regard to the legality of the preſent parliament. This doubt was certainly very ill founded: becauſe the calling of a parliament is part of the executive power, which had been lodged in the king by the act of ſettlement. Had this objection been deemed of force ſufficient to have procured the diſſolution of the preſent parliament, the conſequence might have been fatal to the liberties of Europe, as all the preparations for opening the enſuing campaign muſt have been ſuſpended till a new parliament could have been aſſembled. But the obſervation was happily thought ſo frivolous by the houſe that it was not ſeconded.

The commons now applied themſelves to the diſcovery of ways and means for raiſing the ſupplies; but were ſoon ſtopped in their progreſs by the diſcovery of an alarming ſcene of bribery and corruption; in which not only the agents of the army, and ſome members of parliament, but even the privy-counſellors themſelves, were deeply concerned. The enquiry into theſe corrupt practices was as accidental as it was neceſſary. It was occaſioned by the juſt complaints of ſome inhabitants of Royſton, in Hertfordſhire, againſt the abuſes of officers and ſoldiers in demanding ſubſiſtence-money. Their petition being laid before the houſe of commons, and the petitioners, together with Mr. Tracy Pauncefort, agent of colonel Haſtings's regiment, and the officers complained of being heard and examined, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That the officers and ſoldiers of the army demanding and exacting ſubſiſtence money in their quarters, or on their march, is arbitrary and illegal, and a great violation of the rights and liberties of the ſubject:" and it was ordered, "That the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts do lay before the houſe their obſervations of the abuſes and ill practices committed by the agents of the army; and that agent Pauncefort ſhould forthwith lay before the houſe a particular account of all the monies received by him from the earl of Renalagh, and the times of ſuch receipts, ſince the twenty-eighth of May laſt; and how he had paid the ſums, when, and to whom, and what remained in his hand.

Purſuant to this order, Mr. Harley, from the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts, preſented to the houſe their obſervations on the ill practices committed by the agents; which being taken into conſideration, and Pauncefort, upon bringing in his accounts, being examined, as alſo colonel Haſtings, major Montcal, and ſome other officers and agents, it was reſolved by the houſe, that agent Tracy Pauncefort, for neglecting to pay the ſubſiſtence-money to the officers and ſoldiers quartered at Royſton, having monies in his hands to do the ſame, be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe." About a fortnight after, Pauncefort was again examined; and refuſing to anſwer ſeveral queſtions, though required on pain of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That his abſolute refuſal to anſwer to a matter of fact, demanded of him by the houſe, he had violated the privilege, and contemned the authority of the houſe, and the fundamental conſtitution thereof;" and was immediately ſent a priſoner to the Tower for his offence.

The next perſon who felt the weight of the commons reſentment, was Mr. Edward Pauncefort, brother to the agent; who being examined, it was reſolved, "That he, for contriving to cheat colonel Haſtings's regiment, and for giving a bribe to obtain the king's pardon, be taken into cuſtody." Mr. Henry Guy was the next victim. He was a member of the houſe, and ſecretary to the treaſury; but for having taken a bribe of two hundred guineas for procuring the arrears due to a regiment to be paid, was committed to the Tower, and deprived of his poſt. The members were more provoked, becauſe it was generally believed that he, together with the ſpeaker, had been deeply concerned in corrupting the members of the houſe of commons. He had held his poſt in the reigns of the two preceding kings, and the ſhare he had in the ſecret diſtribution of the money, had rendered him a neceſſary aſſiſtant in thoſe meaſures.

Having proceeded to a ſufficient length, the commons agreed to repreſent the whole to the king, ſetting forth the notorious abuſes, ill practices, and intolerable exactions of the colonels and their agents, on the inferior officers and common ſoldiers; and his majeſty promiſed to take the neceſſary care to redreſs theſe grievances. Colonel Haſtings was immediately diſcharged, and his regiment given to Sir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel.

The commons proceeded in their enquiries with regard to ſeveral other ſpecies of corruption, and ſeveral of a very extraordinary nature were diſcovered. But before they had finiſhed their enquiries, the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am come to give you thanks for the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war in which we are engaged; and, at the ſame time, to conclude this ſeſſion, which cannot be continued longer without manifeſt prejudice to the end for which theſe ſupplies were given, the ſeaſon of the year making it ſo neceſſary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wiſhed our buſineſs at home would have allowed me to have been there ſooner.

"I will take care to place the adminiſtration of affairs, during my abſence, in ſuch perſons, on whoſe care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, that every one of you, in your ſeveral ſtations, will be aſſiſting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you will be more than ordinarily diligent in preſerving the public peace." The king immediately embarked for Holland, after nominating a council of regency, in which neither the princeſs nor prince of Denmark had any ſhare. This occaſioned a freſh ſubject of complaint, and the king's conduct was reflected on with great ſeverity.

This campaign was more favourable to the allies than any of the preceding. William had now the honour of ſtopping the French arms, and even of taking Namur. Marſhal Boufflers, a diſtinguiſhed general, was in the place, with near ſixteen thouſand men; while an army of an hundred thouſand, under the command of marſhal Villeroy, threatened the beſiegers with a battle. The garriſon behaved with the utmoſt intrepidity; but the prudence of William rendered all his attempts abortive. He took Namur in the ſight of the French army. Lewis, enraged at this diſappointment, bombarded Bruſſels, in revenge for the bombardment of Dieppe, Havre de Grace, St. Malo, Dunkirk, and Calais, by the Engliſh the preceding year. The latter alſo attempted new bombardments, but with no remarkable ſucceſs. All Europe was in flames, and exhauſted of men and money, for the quarrel of ſome particular princes, who, perhaps, never ſighed over the calamities of their ſubjects. Diſtreſs, however piercing, had no effect on them; they were deaf to the voice of complaint.

When William returned from the continent, he was received in triumph by his ſubjects. The conqueſt of Namur, in ſo remarkable a manner, merited all their applauſe. On this occaſion he affected a popularity, which being unnatural, was aukward, and could not be laſting. It, however, ſerved to gain him ſeveral friends, and greatly retarded the machinations of his enemies.

The former parliament being diſſolved, a new one met at Weſtminſter on the twenty-ſecond of November; and having elected Paul Foley, Eſq; for the ſpeaker, the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he obſerved, "That he had engaged in the preſent war by the advice of his firſt parliament; that the laſt had, with great chearfulneſs, aſſiſted him in carrying it on; and that he doubted not but the preſent would as readily ſupport him in it, by granting the neceſſary ſupplies: that he could not but take notice, on this occaſion, of the ſignal bravery of the Engliſh forces during the laſt campaign, which had reflected equal honour on themſelves, and on the nation to which they belonged. He lamented, as a great misfortune, his having been obliged, from the very beginning of his reign, to aſk ſuch large aids of his people; but, at the ſame time, obſerved, they were abſolutely neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war. He took notice, that the funds had been deficient, and the condition of the civil liſt ſuch, that he could not poſſibly ſubſiſt without their care. He told them, that compaſſion obliged him to mention the miſerable condition of the French proteſtants who ſuffered for their religion, and the redreſs of the bad ſtate of the coin, though they would prove an additional charge. He recommended to them the framing bills for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, the advancement of trade, particularly that of the Weſt-Indies; and for recruiting the army in ſuch a manner, that the people ſhould have no cauſe to complain: and concluded with exhorting them to uſe diſpatch, and to avoid heats and diviſions."

The firſt bill paſſed by this parliament, was that reſpecting trials for high-treaſon; a ſubject which, though of the laſt importrnce, had hitherto been ſubject to many abuſes. By this bill it was enacted, that the perſon impeached ſhould have a copy of the impeachment five days before the trial came on, and be allowed counſel for his defence: that no perſon ſhould be impeached, but on the teſtimony of two credible witneſſes: that if the impeachment conſiſted of ſeveral articles, the two witneſſes could only be conſidered as one, when their depoſitions were not upon the ſame article: that the perſon accuſed ſhould have a liſt of the witneſſes two days before the trial; and that, three years after the crime was committed, no accuſation ſhould take place, unleſs the crime was an attempt againſt the life of the king. The lords added a clauſe, whereby a peer was to be judged by the whole houſe of lords. Had this law taken place ſooner,

ſooner, it would have ſaved the lives of many illuſtrious men, and liberty would have had a rampart againſt deſpotiſm and miniſterial vengeance. It is a deplorable conſideration, that the beneficial ſcience of legiſlation arrives ſo ſlowly at perfection, even in points where the intereſts of humanity are ſo greatly affected.

This celebrated bill being diſpatched, the commons proceeded to take into their conſideration the ſupplies for the ſucceeding year. The neceſſary eſtimates were laid before them, and they voted five millions twenty-four thouſand eight hundred and fifty-three pounds for that ſervice. The funds neceſſary for raiſing this prodigious ſum were the following: 1. By a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound. 2. By duties continued on wine, vinegar, tobacco, Eaſt-India goods, and other merchandizes. 3. An additional duty upon all French commodities. 4. Duties on low wines or ſpirits of French extraction. 5. Duties continued upon ſalt, glaſs-wares, tobacco-pipes, &c. They alſo ſettled a fund for raiſing five hundred thouſand pounds a year for the civil liſt; and another for raiſing fifteen thouſand pounds a year for the relief of the French proteſtants.

The next ſubject that engaged the attention of the parliament, was the amendment of the current coin; and they reſolved, that the eſtabliſhed ſtandard ſhould be preſerved, with regard to weight and fineneſs; and that the loſs ariſing from calling in the old money ſhould be borne by the public, and a fund was eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe. The new coinage was placed under the direction of Sir Iſaac Newton, and Mr. Locke lent his aſſiſtance. Nor is it in ſuch circumſtances only that men of letters may be uſeful to the ſtate.

A. D. 1696. From the very beginning of this reign, conſpiracies, many of them imaginary, had been frequently talked of; but a real plot was now formed, either to carry off or aſſaſſinate William, and reſtore his rival to the throne he had abdicated. The earl of Ayleſbury, lord Montgomery, and ſeveral other perſons of leſs diſtinction, were at the head of this conſpiracy. The duke of Berwick, James's natural ſon, paſſed ſecretly through the kingdom, encouraging the Jacobites, and declaring that an invaſion was ready to take place. He conjured them to exert themſelves on this occaſion, and concerted meaſures for rendering the attempt ſucceſsful.

While the conſpirators were labouring, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to increaſe their party, the ruffians, who were to execute the execrable deed, held private meetings in London, where the proper meaſures for carrying it into execution were concerted. Sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, and a man of undaunted courage, may be conſidered as the leader of this deſperate band. He was a furious bigot to the church of Rome, cloſe, circumſpect, and cruel. He came into England in the beginning of January; and having procured a private commiſſion from James, the reſt of the party implicitly obeyed his orders. This enthuſiaſt undertook the horrid taſk of aſſaſſinating the king, with the aſſiſtance of forty horſe. The king uſually hunted at Richmond on every Saturday; and it was reſolved to attack him in his return to Kenſington, in the lane between Brentford and Turnham-green. This ſcheme was ſo well laid, that it would, probably, have ſucceeded, had not one Pendergraſs revealed the whole the very day before it was intended to be executed.

Pendergraſs was an Iriſh officer, and a Roman catholic, and therefore conſidered as a proper perſon to engage in ſo deſperate an attempt. He was accordingly ſollicited, and ſeemed at firſt very willing to engage. But reflecting on the horrid barbarity of an act deteſted by God and man, he repaired immediately to the earl of Portland, and diſcovered to him the whole ſcheme, begging to be introduced to his majeſty. Portland informed the king of this diſcovery, and Pendergraſs was admitted into his majeſty's cloſet, where he fully revealed all the particulars he knew relative to this horrid conſpiracy. He at firſt, however, refuſed to give up the names of the conſpirators; but, on the king's promiſing that he ſhould not be produced as an evidence, without his own conſent, he gave his majeſty a liſt of the aſſaſſins.

Every meaſure was now taken to render the whole contrivance abortive. Admiral Ruſſel ſailed immediately for the coaſt of France; and the enemy, confounded at his appearance, retired into their harbours; and James, who was arrived at Calais in order to embark, retired to his court at St. Germains, overwhelmed with grief and diſappointment. In the mean time, the king laid the whole deſign before the parliament. Both houſes immediately waited upon his majeſty with the moſt loyal addreſſes; wherein they congratulated him on the eſcape of his royal perſon from the deſigns of his enemies; declared their abhorrence of ſuch villainous and traiterous attempts; and ſolemnly promiſed to ſtand by and defend his royal perſon againſt all his enemies, open and concealed: adding, that if he ſhould fall by a violent attempt, they would ſeverely revenge it on the Roman catholics. They likewiſe drew up an aſſociation to the ſame purpoſe, which was ſigned by all the members of the houſe; wherein they declared king William their rightful and lawful king, and mutually engaged to ſtand by each other in his defence. The king returned them thanks for their zeal for his perſon, and declared he ſhould always be ready to riſque his life in defence of the laws, religion, and liberties of the nation.

Several of the conſpirators were ſeized, tried at the Old Bailey, where they were found guilty of high-treaſon on the cleareſt evidence, and ſuffered at Tyburn.

Sir John Fenwick had a conſiderable ſhare in the conſpiracy. There were two witneſſes againſt him, but one of them diſappeared without giving evidence in the court. He had, however, given a written depoſition, and the legality of this was ſtrongly debated in parliament. The advocates of the perſon accuſed maintained, that, according to all the rules of juriſprudence, the evidence ought to be preſent, and to be confronted by the priſoner; that the depoſitions of the dead were inadmiſſible, and thoſe of the abſent equally void; that the parliament, though not ſubject to the rules of inferior courts, was nevertheleſs ſubject to the eternal and invariable rules of equity; and that the late act relating to proceſſes of high-treaſon, would be openly violated by a contrary practice. Theſe arguments, however plauſible, were too weak to gain a majority. Eſtabliſhed principles gave way to the ſecurity of government. A bill of attainder was paſſed againſt Fenwick, and he was executed purſuant to his ſentence. Several others, among whom Sir John Friend, a brewer in the Minories, was the principal, beſides the conſpirators who were to have executed the horrid deed, ſuffered for their treaſon.

The campaign was opened on the continent by the allies burning a prodigious magazine which had been laid up at Givet, for the uſe of the enemy. But though the beginning was proſperous, and the war continued with the ſame animoſity: the powers engaged in it were no longer capable of making the ſame efforts. Notwithſtanding the ardour of William, the campaign in Flanders had no ſtriking events. Lewis XIV. leſs fortunate than before, was now deſirous of peace. He accordingly diſpatched M. de Callieras, as his ambaſſador to the ſtates-general, for ſettling ſuch preliminaries as might ſerve as a baſis for a treaty. The Dutch, with the conſent of king William, liſtened to the propoſal; and it was agreed to accept the mediation of the king of Sweden, which had already been offered by the baron Lillenroot, his ambaſſador at the Hague. Lewis, however, did not wholly depend upon negotiation; he made very advantageous offers to the duke of Savoy, and drew him off from the grand alliance.

This perfidious conduct of the duke greatly enraged the allies: his miniſters, indeed, attempted to excuſe it, by alledging, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to embrace the offers of France, in order to prevent his own ruin; and that common prudence would not ſuffer him to let ſlip an opportunity of procuring ſuch ſingular advantages to his own family.

The campaign in Catalonia, and on the Rhine, was as barren of events as that in Flanders: the advantage, if any, was on the ſide of the allies; but all the armies retired into winter quarters in the beginning of October.

As the diſtreſs of the army abroad was chiefly owing to the calling in and recoining the money, ſo the ſame calamity was felt among the manufacturers and labourers, who were moſt of them idle, occaſioned by the ſcarcity of coin, few maſters being able to employ any workmen. An order of council was therefore iſſued in July, directing the juſtices of the peace to meet frequently in their reſpective diviſions, in order to conſult the moſt effectual means to relieve and ſubſiſt the poor, till a ſufficient quantity of money could be iſſued to relieve the preſent ſcarcity. The attorney-general was alſo ordered to proſecute all thoſe who had entered into confederacies not to employ any workmen in the woollen and other manufactures during the preſent ſcarcity of coin.

As ſoon as the armies were gone into winter quarters, William returned to England, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the twentieth of October. He told them, "that he thought it a great happineſs that no diſadvantage had happened abroad, nor any diſorder at home during the laſt ſummer, conſidering the great diſappointments in the funds, and the trouble that had ariſen in receiving the money: that the buſineſs they had before them would be attended with great difficulty, as they were not only to provide for the ſervice of the enſuing year, but alſo to make good the deficiencies of the laſt." He obſerved, "that overtures of peace had indeed been made him; but he was certain they would prove abortive; that the only way to procure an honourable peace was to treat ſword in hand; and therefore the ſupplies for the ſucceeding muſt, at leaſt, be equal to thoſe for the laſt. He alſo preſſed them to maintain the honour of parliament, by making good the funds they had granted. He reminded them of the civil liſt and the French proteſtants, and of making ſome farther proviſion for remedying the difficulties relating to the coin, and for recovering the national credit."

The commons, in anſwer to his majeſty's ſpeech, aſſured him in their addreſs, "That though this was the eighth year they had aſſiſted him with large ſupplies, for carrying on this juſt and neceſſary war, they ſhould be neither amuſed nor diverted from their firm reſolution of obtaining, by war, a ſafe and honourable peace:" and concluded with declaring, "That they would continue to ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies, both at home and abroad."

They accordingly voted five millions for the ſea and land ſervice for the ſucceeding year; beſides a ſupply for the civil liſt, and new funds for making good the deficiencies, and ſecuring the public debts, which now amounted to near twelve millions. Notwithſtanding it was ſo vaſtly large, they purſued ſuch vigorous meaſures, that they ſurmounted every difficulty, and placed the credit of the nation on a ſure and ſolid baſis.

A. D. 1697. The parliament having finiſhed the national buſineſs, the king came to the houſe of peers on the ſixteenth of April; and after giving the royal aſſent to the bills they had paſſed, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he thanked them for the large ſupplies they had granted him; congratulated them on the ſucceſs of their endeavours for reſtoring public credit; acquainted them with his intention of paſſing over to the continent; and begged they would carry with them into their reſpective counties the ſame loyal principles they had ſo conſpicuouſly diſplayed in parliament.

The conferences for a peace were opened at Ryſwic on the twenty-ninth of May, and the negotiation proceeded with very little trouble. The demands of Spain, that France ſhould reſtore all the conqueſts that had been made during the war, ſeemed the only difficulty. Lewis was therefore determined to exert all his force againſt that kingdom, in order to induce the Spaniſh plenipotentiaries to accept the offers of France. The city of Barcelona was accordingly beſieged and taken by the duke de Vendôme. De Pontis, a French commodore, was ſent, with a ſmall fleet, to the Weſt-Indies, where he took and plundered the town of Carthagena, and returned with an immenſe booty. Theſe ſucceſſes tended greatly to haſten the concluſion of the treaty. Lewis gave up almoſt all his conqueſts. To Spain he reſtored Luxembourg, Mons, Aeth, Courtray, beſides what he had taken in the neighbourhood of the Pyranees. To the Empire, Friburg, Briſac, Philipſburg, &c. And, laſtly, he acknowledged the prince of Orange king of England. Thus William was confirmed in his poſſeſſion of the throne, while France abandoned all the fruits of her victories. Lewis ſubmitted to theſe conditions more from policy than generoſity. The burden of the war was become intolerable. The victors and the vanquiſhed were equally weakened. It was abſolutely neceſſary that the finances ſhould be repaired, and the murmurings of the people ſatiſfied. Lewis, after he had deluged Europe with blood to ſatisfy his ambition, was obliged to purchaſe peace at the expence of his conqueſts.

Soon after the ſigning of this treaty, William returned to England, where he was received with great demonſtrations of joy. On the third of December, he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein he obſerved, "That the war he had entered into by the advice of his people, was, by their aſſiſtance, brought to the end he had ever propoſed, a ſafe and honourable peace: that he was ſorry, however, to acquaint them, that his ſubjects could not immediately find that relief from the peace they might expect, the funds having fallen ſhort, and there remaining ſo great a debt to the navy and army, beſides what was wanting to ſupport the civil liſt. He obſerved, that the navy was increaſed almoſt double ſince his acceſſion, and could not be ſupported without a proportional increaſe of money; and he believed they would agree with him in allowing, that the chief ſtrength of England muſt ever conſiſt in a powerful navy: that, conſidering the ſtate of affairs abroad, he was of opinion, that the kingdom could not be ſafe without a land force. He promiſed to rectify whatever abuſes might have crept into any part of the adminiſtration during the war, and effectually to diſcourage prophaneneſs and immorality. He expreſſed his ſatiſfaction with the proofs his people had given him of their loyalty and attachment to his perſon;" and concluded with declaring, "That as he had, at the hazard of his life, reſcued their religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremeſt danger; ſo he ſhould place the chief glory of his reign in preſerving and leaving them entire to poſterity."

The parliament, in their addreſs, complimented him on the peace; and aſſured him, "That they would be always ready to ſupport his majeſty, who had confirmed them in the quiet poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties; and, by putting an end to the war, fully completed their deliverance."

But notwithſtanding theſe congratulations and compliments, they oppoſed his deſigns. This politic and warlike prince was deſirous of eſtabliſhing a ſtanding army, which could not fail of rendering him reſpectable both at home and abroad. The conduct of Lewis, who ſtill retained a conſiderable part of his army, ſeemed to lay the other powers under a neceſſity of doing the ſame. This was a very plauſible reaſon, and adopted by ſeveral of the members; but the majority was alarmed at the king's propoſal. It had an apparent tendency to eſtabliſh deſpotiſm on the ruins of the conſtitution. They were perſuaded the nation would ſoon loſe its privileges, and the people their liberties, if mercenary troops were at the command of the government. "This cuſtom," ſaid they, "being once eſtabliſhed will become a maxim of ſtate; and elections, parliaments, every thing will depend upon the caprice of the court. Is not the kingdom ſufficiently defended by the ocean that ſurrounds it? May not the militia be eſtabliſhed and regularly exerciſed? And will not ſuch men be more zealous in the defence of their country than mercenaries? Will not theſe with a formidable fleet be a ſufficient ſecurity againſt any invaſion?" Theſe arguments ſeemed unanſwerable, and prevailed with the majority. Ten thouſand only of the land forces were retained; and three thouſand added to the marine.

Highly offended with this reſolution of the commons, and perſuaded that they ſuſpected he had formed deſigns againſt their liberties, William declared he would have had nothing to do with the government, if he could have ſuſpected the parliament could have been guilty of ſo much diſtruſt and ingratitude.

A. D. 1698. The commons now applied themſelves aſſiduouſly to the diſcovery of means for the diſcharge of the public debt. The neceſſary ſupplies amounted to near five millions ſterling; and it required all their wiſdom to raiſe ſo large a ſum, after the nation had been impoveriſhed by the late war. The Eaſt India company offered to advance ſeven hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervice of the public, at the rate of four per cent. intereſt, provided the legiſlature would ſettle on them the excluſive trade to India. This offer was favourably received by the miniſtry, and would, in all probability, have been accepted, had not another company of merchants made more advantageous propoſals. They offered to lend the government two millions on the ſame terms. They alſo propoſed that their ſubſcribers ſhould not be obliged to trade in a joint ſtock; but if any number of their members deſired to be incorporated, a charter ſhould be granted them for that purpoſe. The laſt propoſal was thought the moſt eligible, and a bill was accordingly brought into parliament, and eaſily paſſed the commons; but on its being ſent up to the lords, the old company petitioned the houſe, and they were heard by their council againſt the bill. They alledged, "that the company had actually acquired, at their own expence, revenues at Fort St. George, Fort St. David, and Bombay, as well as in Perſia, and other parts, amounting to forty-four thouſand pounds per annum, ariſing from cuſtoms and licences for a great number of particulars: that they had alſo erected forts and ſettlements, and procured ſettlements in the iſland of Sumatra, and on the coaſt of Malabar, without which the pepper-trade muſt have been actually loſt to England: that they had alſo a ſtrong fort in the kingdom of Bengal, and alſo many factories, buildings and ſettlements in various other parts, having purchaſed, at high rates, of the Indian princes many valuable privileges and immunities: that they were encouraged to do this from a preſumption that their rights and inheritance would always be objects of the nation's care: that ſince this bill had been brought into parliament, the company had agreed to ſubmit their preſent ſtock to a valuation of fifty per cent. viz. twenty per cent. for their dead ſtock, namely their forts, factories and lands, and thirty per cent. for their quick ſtock, which they were content even to warrant at that rate: and upon theſe terms the company likewiſe offered to raiſe a ſubſcription of two millions."

To this it was anſwered by the council for the new ſubſcribers, "That the old company in reciting their charters, had forgot to mention the proviſos they contained, the kings of England, who granted them, having reſerved to themſelves a diſcretionary power to make them void on three years warning: that the king could not grant the trade, excluſive of all others, by his charter alone, it being directly contrary to poſitive laws; nor had his preſent majeſty in fact granted any ſuch excluſive right: that ſeveral recoveries had been made at law againſt the company for proſecuting ſuch pretended right: that his majeſty's meſſage to the commons in the year 1692 plainly ſignified that the concurrence of parliament was neceſſary for making a complete and uſeful ſettlement of this trade: that the company's managers, in order to obtain their laſt new charter and regulations, had made no ſcruple of having recourſe to the indirect methods of bribery and corruption: that it was never eſteemed a breach of public faith, nor a derogation from the authority of the great ſeal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patents annulled by parliament, when it appeared that ſuch grants were either unprofitable, or contrary to the common rights of the ſubject; neither did any of our king's think themſelves bound in honour or conſcience to refuſe paſſing an act of parliament for the annulling of ſuch grants: that moreover kings having been often deceived by ſuch grants, they have even frequently been annulled by the common courſe of law."

On the other hand it was replied, and urged, in behalf of the old company, "That the properties of many families, widows, and orphans, would be greatly affected by the bill now depending, which they ſaid made no proviſion for a determined ſtock; ſo that it may hereafter happen that the trade may be loſt to the nation for want of a ſufficient capital to carry it on; it appearing, by thirty years experience, that it requires at leaſt ſix hundred thouſand pounds a year to carry it on in its full extent: that by this bill the new ſubſcribers were permitted to trade during the three years, as well as the company, which is directly contrary to the charter, will create great confuſion, and render the ſaid three years allowed the old company of no benefit, becauſe they are ſtill bound to export to the value of one hundred thouſand pounds annually in our own manufactures, tho' the new ſubſcribers are under no ſuch obligations: that the old company are beſides obliged to pay taxes to keep up forts, factories, &c. while the new ſubſcribers are to have an equal benefit of the trade without either: that ſince the laſt ſubſcription in 1693, the company has loſt, either by accidents, or the calamities of war, twelve large ſhips, which, with their cargoes, would have ſold for near a million and a half ſterling; and yet, notwithſtanding ſuch loſſes, they have paid in cuſtoms ſince that period two hundred and ninety-five thouſand pounds, beſides eighty-five thouſand in taxes: that they had, moreover, ſupplied his majeſty in Holland, on a very preſſing occaſion, with ſix thouſand barrels of gunpowder; and had alſo, at a time of great extremity, ſubſcribed eighty thouſand pounds for circulating exchequer bills, at the inſtance of the treaſury; and that many hundred families have their whole fortunes depending in the ſtock of the preſent company, who muſt be utterly ruined if this bill takes effect."

All theſe arguments, however powerful, were urged in vain. The bill paſſed the lords in favour of the new company, without paying any regard to ancient charters, or the fortunes of a multitude of families. They received their charter on the third of September; and on the fifth his majeſty incorporated them as one joint-ſtock excluſive company, trading to the Eaſt Indies.

But the parliament did not confine their diſquiſitions wholly to the commercial ſtate of the nation, and the ways and means for raiſing the large ſupplies that were become abſolutely neceſſary; they exerted themſelves nobly to prevent that corruption of manners which was every day gaining ground in the kingdom. Perſuaded that unleſs care be taken to keep the people's morals from being tainted, wealth and power will only become the ſources of poiſon; that the vices of the citizens are infectious to the body politic; that a ſtate without virtue has almoſt as many enemies as ſubjects; and that its grandeur is a preſage of its ruin: they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, in which they enumerated the exceſſive irregularities that prevailed, and were daily increaſing; and requeſted him to iſſue orders to the magiſtrates to put the laws in force againſt impiety and debauchery. Their addreſs was very favourably received. The king promiſed to attempt, without delay, a reformation of manners, and teſtified his zeal for the ſuppreſſion of impious books, which uſually corrupt at once both the heart and the underſtanding. Schemes of this nature, however laudable, however neceſſary in themſelves, are ſeldom executed. A ſociety for the reformation of manners, under the protection of his majeſty, was eſtabliſhed; the members of which engaged to inform the magiſtrates of ſuch debaucheries and vices as came within their knowledge. The fines impoſed were deſtined for charitable uſes. A number of eccleſiaſtics were to promote virtue by public lectures; and a liberal proviſion was made for their maintenance. Theſe eſtabliſhmenes, and others of a ſimilar kind, could not fail of being uſeful, eſpecially to the poor. But informations are always odious. It is the buſineſs of people in office to inſpect the conduct of the citizens. And, with regard to the reformation of manners, nothing can be ſufficient but thoſe powerful reſources which government alone can employ with ſucceſs. The example of the court would perhaps be more effectual than any other method that could be practiſed.

While the parliament was laudably employed in contriving ways and means for raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies, and endeavouring to ſtop the progreſs of vice and immorality, Peter Alexowitz, czar of Muſcovy, ſince known by the appellation of Peter the Great, viſited this kingdom. Having formed the noble deſign of civilizing his barbarous ſubjects, of introducing the arts and ſciences among them, and of rendering the forces of his empire by ſea and land equal to thoſe of his politer neighbours, he travelled through moſt countries in Europe to gain inſtruction. He was particularly deſirous of eſtabliſhing a marine, and of having a reſpectable fleet in the Baltic: and therefore his principal intention was to learn the art of ſhip-building. In the ſummer of the preceding year he ſent an ambaſſy to Holland, to regulate ſome points of commerce with the ſtates-general, and accompanied his ambaſſadors diſguiſed as one of their retinue. While he was on this tour he diſcovered himſelf to king William, and had a private interview with that prince at Utrecht, and in conſequence of his invitation he now viſited England. He ſtaid here above three months, during which time he was lodged and entertained with all the magnificence poſſible for a prince, who choſe to remain unknown. He paſſed his time here, as he had done in Holland, in examining the dock-yards, and improving himſelf in the art of ſhip-building; to attain which he worked ſeveral hours every day as a common ſhipwright, in the royal yard at Deptford. At his departure William made him ſeveral magnificent preſents; and particularly the yatch in which he himſelf uſed to paſs over to Holland. She was a very beautiful veſſel, finely adorned, and called the Royal Tranſport. And it being thought abſolutely neceſſary to gain his friendſhip, he was allowed to engage ſeveral Engliſh artificers in his ſervice; and to take two of the ſcholars from Chriſt-church hoſpital; and theſe afterwards laid the foundation of the marine academy at Peterſburgh.

The Scots, deſirous of ſharing in the advantages reſulting from commerce, had formed a commercial company in order to carry on their foreign trade with more ſpirit and advantage. And animated with the ſame ſpirit of ſelf-intereſt which had carried ſo many perſons to the New World, they eſtabliſhed, at a great expence, a colony in the Streights of Darien; the Iſthmus that connects South and North America. This eſtabliſhment did not reſemble the bloody conqueſts of the Spaniards. It was made by agreement with the natives of the country; but the Spaniards complained of it as an infringement of the late treaty. The Engliſh and Dutch conſidered the Scots as dangerous rivals, and the colony they had eſtabliſhed as prejudicial to their commerce. William therefore forbade all correſpondence with this new colony. The Scots, finding themſelves diſappointed of the treaſures they expected, made the moſt violent complaints; and their parliament adopted their cauſe. The moſt animating ſpeeches were made in that aſſembly, and every thing ſeemed to threaten a revolt. The king was alarmed, and it was only by time, addreſs and flattering promiſes, that he put a ſtop to an affair that threatened the moſt alarming conſequences.

Charles II. of Spain had long been in a very declining ſtate; and having no iſſue, the conſequence that might attend his large dominions paſſing either into the Bourbon family, or that of Auſtria, alarmed all Europe. William paſſed over to the continent, where he negotiated a treaty with Lewis XIV. for the diviſion of the Spaniſh monarchy. By this treaty, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the province of Guipuſcoa, and ſeveral other places dependent on Spain, were deſtined to the dauphin; the Milaneſe to the archduke, Charles II. ſon to the emperor; and the reſt to the young prince of Bavaria, who was about eight years of age. That prince died ſoon after the treaty; and it now became neceſſary to negotiate a new one. Bavaria was aſſigned to the archduke; Lorraine added to the poſſeſſions of the dauphin; and Milan given to the duke of Lorraine.

During the king's abſence, the elections for a new parliament were carried on in England with all the appearance of freedom: the miniſtry giving themſelves very little trouble to influence the voters. The returns were, however, generally in favour of revolution principles. The aſſembly met on the third of December, when William opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein he ſtrongly recommended to them the keeping up ſuch a force, as might preſerve that weight and influence they at preſent enjoyed in the affairs of the continent; and their making a farther progreſs in diſcharging the national debt contracted by the war. He concluded with recommending three popular ſubjects to their particular attention: the making proviſion for the poor; the advancement of trade; and the diſcouraging vice and prophaneneſs.

It is remarkable that in this ſpeech William made no mention of the partition treaty he had ſo lately concluded abroad, and which afterwards ſo greatly excited the attention of the kingdom. This was induſtriouſly concealed both from the parliament and the privy-council. Probably he ſuſpected the ſincerity of Lewis, and therefore thought it extremely neceſſary to keep a good body of troops in readineſs to compel the French monarch to obſerve the late treaty in caſe of the king of Spain's death.

Ignorant of the partition treaty, and of the neceſſity of keeping a large body of troops in pay, the parliament took immediately that part of the king's ſpeech into conſideration. William, when he paſſed over to Holland, had left orders with the miniſtry to retain ſixteen thouſand men in the ſervice, notwithſtanding the vote of the commons, by which the army was limited to ten thouſand. This arbitrary act ſo irritated the new parliament, that they reſolved to oppoſe the king in all his demands. They accordingly came immediately to the following reſolution, “That all the land forces in Engliſh pay, exceeding ſeven thouſand men, and theſe his majeſty's natural born ſubjects, be forthwith paid off and diſbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thouſand men, all his majeſty's natural born ſubjects, be likewiſe forthwith diſbanded and paid off.” This reſolution being paſſed, a bill was ordered in; and ſoon paſſed both houſes; in conſequence of which not only the French proteſtant regiments, but even the king's favourite Dutch guards were to be removed out of the Britiſh dominions.

William was exaſperated to the higheſt degree at this conduct of the parliament. Their jealouſy ſo deeply affected him, that he actually formed a reſolution of abandoning the government, and had even compoſed a ſpeech which he intended to have delivered on that occaſion; but was diverted from his raſh deſign by his moſt intimate friends; and at laſt perſuaded to give the royal aſſent to the bill for reducing the army.

A. D. 1699. Accordingly on the ſecond of February he came to the houſe of peers, and addreſſed himſelf to the parliament in the following manner: "I am come to paſs the bill for diſbanding the forces as ſoon as I knew it was ready for my aſſent. Though the reduction of the army to ſo inconſiderable a number, may, in our preſent circumſtances, be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences; and though I might juſtly complain of the harſh treatment I have received in being deprived of thoſe guards who accompanied me into this kingdom, and have conſtantly attended me in all my fortunes, yet as I am convinced that nothing can be more prejudicial to our common intereſt, than to ſuffer any jealouſy or miſunderſtanding to ariſe between me and my people, I am firmly reſolved to comply with your requeſt.

"Nevertheleſs, after having thus aſſigned my reaſons for paſſing this bill, I muſt likewiſe in diſcharge of the truſt you have repoſed in me, declare, that, in my opinion, the nation is left too naked and defenceleſs; it is your duty, therefore, to take this matter into your conſideration, and immediately to provide ſuch a ſtrength as may be deemed neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of that peace we have ſo lately obtained."

Though the king had paſſed the bill for diſbanding the army, he was very unwilling to part with his guards, and accordingly ſent a meſſage to the commons, informing them, "that the neceſſary preparations were made for tranſporting the guards who came with him into England, and that he intended to ſend them away immedietely, unleſs, out of conſideration to him, the commons could find out ſome way to continue them longer in his ſervice, which his majeſty would take very kindly." But the commons were inexorable. They reminded him of his former promiſe to diſmiſs all foreign troops. The happineſs of the kingdom, they added, depended on the mutual confidence of the prince and the people. That this confidence required him to intruſt the care of his ſacred perſon to his ſubjects.

The king, finding it would be in vain to contend with the commons, he yielded to neceſſity, and the Dutch guards were tranſported to Holland. It muſt be owned that the behaviour of the lower houſe with regard to the Dutch guards, ſtrongly indicated that they were rather inſpired with the ſpirit of ferocious obſtinacy than genuine patriotiſm. William was perſuaded of this, and took no pains to diſguiſe his ſentiments. "Had I as many places to beſtow," ſaid he one day to the earl of Sunderland, "as there are members in the houſe of commons, I ſhould not know what it was to have my will diſputed."

Nothing is more dangerous to the peace of a kingdom than a diſagreement between the branches of the legiſlative power. The commons made it their ſtudy to thwart and vex the king, who, by his political talents, had, in a great meaſure, governed Europe. They examined into adminiſtration, re-eſtabliſhed the old India company, and declared papiſts incapable of inheriting or purchaſing lands. They deliberated on demanding of the king the removal of lord chancellor Somers; and William ſoon after found it neceſſary to deprive him of the ſeals to pleaſe the Tories, who formed the majority in parliament.

On the fourth of May the king came to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he told them, "that having ſat ſo many months, the ſeaſon of the year, as well as their own particular affairs, made it reaſonable they ſhould enjoy a receſs; that he took it for granted they had finiſhed all the bills they thought neceſſary, and he had given his aſſent to all they had preſented to him; that if any thing elſe was wanting to their ſafety, the ſecurity of the public credit, the diſcharge of the national debt, the advancement of trade, the ſuppreſſion of vice, and the employment of the poor, the things he propoſed to them at their meeting, he did not doubt but effectual care would be taken of them next winter; and wiſhed no inconveniency might happen in the interval."

The Spaniſh monarch, who was no ſtranger to the treaty of partition, highly reſented their uſurping a power to diſpoſe of his dominions without his conſent. He determined therefore to make a will in favour of the archduke, ſecond ſon to Leopold, the reigning emperor. The queen of Spain alſo uſed her utmoſt endeavours to give the crown to that young prince, to whom ſhe was ſo nearly related. She accordingly new modelled the council; beſtowed the government of Milan upon prince Vaudemont; appointed the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt, viceroy of Catalonia, and carried the ſick king to Toledo, under pretence that the air of Madrid was unwholeſome.

But the court of Vienna, by its indiſcreet and imperious conduct, rendered all theſe meaſures abortive. Charles determined not to make a will in favour of the archduke. On the other hand the marquis d'Harcourt, ambaſſador of Lewis XIV. managed the Spaniards with more dexterity and addreſs. Their inveterate antipathy to France decreaſed every day. The grandees were as unwilling as their maſter to diſmember the monarchy: and France alone ſeemed capable of preventing an incident ſo deſtructive to the honour and power of their country. They adviſed Charles therefore to give the preference to a prince of that nation. Pope Innocent XII. who then filled the papal chair, was conſulted on this intereſting ſubject, and approved the meaſure, as agreeable to the laws of Spain, and the intereſt of religion.

Lewis, ignorant of this reſolution in favour of his family, cauſed ſixty thouſand of his beſt troops to advance towards Catalonia, while a great number of ſhips and gallies cruized along the coaſts and entered the Spaniſh harbours. It was now abſolutely neceſſary for ſome meaſures to be taken; and the dying monarch ſacrifiсed the intereſts of his family to thoſe of his kingdom: he nominated the duke of Anjou, youngeſt ſon to the dauphin, heir to his dominions, with this proviſo, however, that the two crowns of France and Spain, ſhould never be united.

On the ſixteenth of November William opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he obſerved, that his calling them together ſo early was owing to an abſolute neceſſity of making ſome farther proviſion for the ſecurity of the kingdom by ſea and land; and recommended particularly the repairing the royal navy and fortifying the harbours. He reminded them alſo of making good the deficiences of the funds, diſcharging the national debt, and providing ſupplies for the enſuing year. He told them, he hoped that the nation was already convinced of the good effects of the peace, by the evident increaſe of their trade, which he ſhould uſe his utmoſt endeavours to promote and encourage; that he thought, however, it might receive a farther advantage, by paſſing a bill for puniſhing the unlawful and clandeſtine running of goods; and by employing the poor, who were become a burden to the nation: he declared himſelf to be fully aſſured of the love and affections of his people, which he ſhould endeavour to preſerve, by maintaining their rights and liberties, by ſupporting the eſtabliſhed religion, by diſpenſing juſtice with clemency and impartiality, by countenancing virtue and diſcouraging vice, and by declining no difficulties or dangers to promote their welfare and proſperity." Having particularly declared his intentions, he concluded his ſpeech in the following manner: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the public good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with God's bleſſing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flouriſhing people."

This ſpeech, which certainly breathed nothing but kindneſs, and a concern for the happineſs of his people, gave great offence to the commons. The ſpirit of party magnifies every thing. The expreſſion of "acting with confidence in each other," was conſtrued into an implication of a diſtruſt, or want of confidence in them, and they determined to reſent it. They accordingly returned no addreſs of thanks; but, on the fourth of December, preſented what may be conſidered as a remonſtrance; in which they declared, "That being highly ſenſible nothing was more neceſſary for the peace and welfare of the kingdom, the quieting of the minds of the people, and the diſappointing the deſigns of their enemies, than a mutual and entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, they eſteemed it their greateſt misfortune, that, after having ſo amply provided for the ſecurity of his majeſty and his government, any jealouſy or diſtruſt had been raiſed of their duty and affection: and, at the ſame time, begged leave to repreſent, that it would greatly conduce to the continuing and eſtabliſhing an entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, if he would be pleaſed to ſhew marks of his high diſpleaſure towards ſuch perſons as ſhould preſume to miſrepreſent their proceedings to his majeſty; and they ſhould, on their part, diſcourage all falſe rumours and reports reflecting on his majeſty and his government, whereby any miſunderſtandings might be created between him and his ſubjects."

The king, aſtoniſhed at this repreſentation, replied, "That no perſon had ever yet dared to miſrepreſent the proceedings of either houſe; and if they had, they would immediately have felt the higheſt marks of his diſpleaſure: and that he took very kindly the aſſurance they gave him of diſcouraging all falſe rumours and reports reflecting on himſelf and his government.

A. D. 1700. Theſe proceedings were ill calculated to produce the harmony ſo neceſſary between the different branches of the legiſlature, for rendering the nation reſpectable abroad, and happy at home. The commons did every thing in their power to mortify the king; and William gave them, in return, many indications of his reſentment. They paſſed a bill of reſumption, whereby the eſtates in Ireland he had given to his favourites were taken from them, and became again the property of the crown. But not ſatisfied with this victory, they proceeded to ſuch abſurd lengths in their career, that they came to a reſolution to addreſs his majeſty, that no perſon, who was not a native of his dominions, except the prince of Denmark, ſhould be admitted into his councils of England or Ireland. But before this addreſs could be preſented, the king came to the houſe of peers; and, after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion.

While this ill-humour continued between the king and the houſe of commons, Charles II. of Spain paid the debt of nature. The death of this prince, who left no iſſue, ſeemed to threaten the balance of power in Europe. Lewis XIV. and the emperor Leopold, were related to him in the ſame degree; and the renunciation of Maria Tereſia of Auſtria, wife to Lewis, and eldeſt daughter to Philip III. appeared to the enemies of France an engagement of very little weight. Nor was this of any great conſequence, becauſe the balance of power would be equally deſtroyed, whether Leopold or Lewis obtained the ſucceſſion. This was the true motive that induced William to ſign the treaty of partition, which, it was apprehended, would prevent a general war, as well as the two contending monarchs from becoming too powerful for the other princes of Europe. He was miſtaken; the emperor refuſed to accede to the treaty; and it appeared, on the death of Charles, that he had bequeathed his dominions to the duke of Anjou.

Lewis, for ſome time, heſitated, whether he ſhould accept the bequeſt or not, from the proſpect of a war more formidable than any in which he had hitherto been engaged. But ambition ſoon decided in favour of the will. He, however, thought it neceſſary to juſtify his conduct to the king of England, and the States-general. In order to this, he repreſented, that the treaty of partition had occaſioned great and general complaints; that it was abſolutely impracticable to carry it into execution; and that, in renouncing this treaty, he made large ſacrifices to peace and the public good, having abandoned Sicily, Naples, and ſeveral other territories which France was to have enjoyed.

Theſe arguments were by no means ſolid, and the known ambition of the houſe of Bourbon gave great uneaſineſs to the powers of Europe. The States-general, for ſome time, refuſed to acknowledge the duke of Anjou king of Spain; but being in no condition to oppoſe the progreſs of Lewis, ſhould he attempt to invade their territories, they made a virtue of neceſſity, by acknowledging that prince king of Spain, under the title of Philip V. William diſſembled his intentions; and conſidering himſelf as deſtined to hold the balance of power, which was now on the point of being deſtroyed by the ambition of the houſe of Bourbon, he reſolved, if poſſible, to form a new league, for rendering their alarming attempts abortive.

The king had met with ſo many mortifications during the laſt parliament, that he determined now to make a change in the miniſtry. He accordingly gave his confidence to the earl of Rocheſter, who was at the head of the Tories, and who undertook that the whole party ſhould exert all their power to ſupport the meaſures adopted by his majeſty. That nobleman was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the privy-ſeal was given to the earl of Tankerville; Sir Charles Hedges was made ſecretary of ſtate; lord Godolphin appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; and the management of the commons intruſted to Mr. Robert Harley. The new miniſtry did not, however, think themſelves ſtrong enough to carry their meaſures in the preſent parliament; and it was therefore determined to diſſolve it by proclamation, and ſummon a new one, to meet on the ſixth of February.

The uſual means of corruption were exerted in electing the members; and venality prevailed ſo far, that the Tories had a very conſiderable majority in the houſe of commons. The duke of Glouceſter, only ſurviving ſon of the prince and princeſs of Denmark, dying on the twenty-ninth of July, it became neceſſary to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the crown, after the death of the princeſs of Denmark, that young prince being the laſt of ſeventeen children that had proceeded from this marriage.

A. D. 1701. The new parliament meeting on the ſixth of February, was prorogued till the tenth, when Mr. Harley was choſen ſpeaker; and the next day his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he mentioned the great loſs the nation had ſuſtained by the death of the duke of Glouceſter, which, he obſerved, had rendered it abſolutely neceſſary that a farther proviſion ſhould be made for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line; and therefore earneſtly recommended it to their early and ſerious conſideration. He obſerved, that the death of the king of Spain, together with the declaration he had made with regard to his ſucceſſor, had made ſo great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that it required their particular attention; and that he doubted not but their reſolutions on that important ſubject would be ſuch, as ſhould be moſt conducive to the intereſt and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the peace of Europe. He told them, that conſiderable ſupplies would be neceſſary for the ſervice of the current year; reminded them of the deficiencies and public debts, which were yet unprovided for; and recommended the royal navy particularly to their care; deſired they would exert themſelves in improving the trade of the kingdom, and in making proviſion for the poor.

After providing for the credit of the exchequer-bills, which, on a change of the miniſtry, had fallen near twenty per cent. the commons took into conſideration the great object of ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown. After long debates, it was reſolved, that, in order to exclude every catholic prince from the ſucceſſion, the heir ſhould be of the church of England; that if he were a foreigner, the nation ſhould not engage, without conſent of parliament, in any war for the defence of the dominions he might poſſeſs out of the kingdom; that he ſhould not leave England, Scotland, or Ireland, without the ſame conſent; that when this act of limitation ſhould take effect, no foreigner, though a naturalized inhabitant, unleſs of Engliſh extraction, ſhould be admitted into the council, become a member of either houſe, or obtain, by a grant from the crown, any lands or inheritance: that whoever ſhould hold any penſion or lucrative employment under the king, ſhould be incapable of ſitting in the houſe of commons; and that a pardon, under the great ſeal, ſhould be of no effect againſt an impeachment of the houſe. Having voted theſe regulations, which greatly reſtrained the prerogative, and implied a ſevere cenſure on the preſent government, it was reſolved, that the princeſs Sophia, dutcheſs-dowager of Hanover, and granddaughter to James I. was the next heir in the proteſtant line, after the reſpective deſcendants of the king and the princeſs of Denmark. A bill was ordered to be brought in on theſe reſolutions; and, after paſſing both houſes, received the royal aſſent on the twelfth of June.

The next object of importance that engaged the attention of parliament, was the partition treaty. It is ſaid, that Lewis XIV. diſtributed large ſums among the members of the lower houſe, in order to procure their ſuffrages. But however that be, the commons were ſo far from approving the king's meaſures, that they condemned them with the greateſt aſperity. They complained loudly of its having been ſigned without conſent of parliament; and obſerved not even common decency in their debates. Sir Edward Seymour compared the diviſion which had been made of the Spaniſh territories, to the diſtribution that highwaymen make of their booty; and Mr. Howe had even the inſolence to call it a felonious treaty; an expreſſion which ſo highly incenſed the king, that he is reported to have ſaid, he would have demanded perſonal ſatisfaction with his ſword, had he not been reſtrained by the diſparity of condition between himſelf and the perſon who had offered ſo outrageous an inſult to his honour.

The peers themſelves were far from approving the treaty, but their debates were guided by prudence and diſcretion. They examined its tendency with candour, and then repreſented it, in an addreſs to the king, as incompatible both with the intereſt of England and the ſafety of Europe. They prayed his majeſty to be adviſed by his own ſubjects, and place his confidence in them rather than in ſtrangers. They added, that ſince the French king's accepting the will of Charles II. was a manifeſt violation of the treaty, they humbly adviſed his majeſty, in future treaties with that prince, to proceed with ſuch caution as might carry a real ſecurity.

Though this addreſs was in reality an inſult upon the king, he thought proper to diſſemble his reſentment; and only returned for anſwer, "That their addreſs contained matters of very great moment; and he would always take care, that all treaties he made ſhould be for the honour and ſafety of England."

Lewis XIV. having embraced the will of Charles II. made great preparations for ſupporting the duke of Anjou on the Spaniſh throne; and refuſed to grant any other ſecurity, than that of renewing the peace of Ryſwick. This refuſal being communicated to the parliament, both houſes reſolved to requeſt his majeſty would concert meaſures with the ſtates-general for putting a ſtop to the deſigns of France in the Netherlands; aſſuring him they would always be ready to enable him to fulfil the conditions of the treaty ſubſiſting between England and Holland.

William thanked them for the aſſurances they had given him; and ſaid, he did not doubt but the readineſs they had ſhewn on this occaſion would greatly contribute to the procuring ſuch a ſecurity as they deſired. But he was far from approving their addreſs, as it implied their diſapprobation of a new confederacy, which he was very deſirous of forming. They ſeemed to limit their aſſiſtance to the obtaining a new barrier in the Netherlands, without entering into a war for the recovery of the kingdom of Spain. He therefore thought it moſt prudent to acknowledge the duke of Anjou's title to that crown, and to congratulate him on his acceſſion.

Alarmed and exaſperated at this incident, the emperor loudly complained that he was abandoned by his allies at the very time he ſtood moſt in need of their aſſiſtance. He, however, determined to aſſert his right by force of arms; and accordingly ſent prince Eugene into Italy, at the head of an army, to take poſſeſſion of the dutchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire. Both the pope and the Venetians were attached to the French intereſt, but refuſed to declare themſelves at this important criſis.

The Dutch, who had dearly experienced the ambitious deſigns of the French king, notwithſtanding all his pretenſions of friendſhip and eſteem, exerted themſelves in providing for their own ſecurity, by reinforcing their garriſons, and ſolliciting ſuccours from foreign powers. They alſo wrote a letter to king William, in which they expreſſed the moſt ſincere zeal for the intereſt of England, and earneſtly requeſted that the ſtipulated number of troops might be immediately ſent to their aſſiſtance. The king laid the letter before the parliament, on which the commons came to the following reſolution: "That they will effectually aſſiſt his majeſty to ſupport his allies in maintaining the liberties of Europe; and will immediately provide ſuccours for the ſtates-general, purſuant to the treaty."

The lords went farther: they addreſſed his majeſty in a very warm, affectionate manner; requeſting that his majeſty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the ſtates-general, but that he would enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with them for their common preſervation, and invite into it all princes and ſtates that were concerned in the viſible danger ariſing from the union of France with Spain. They alſo exhorted him to enter into ſuch alliances with the emperor as his majeſty ſhould think prudent; aſſuring him of their reſolution to aſſiſt him in the moſt effectual manner.

But though both houſes had declared their reſolutions to ſupport his majeſty, they determined to ſhew their diſpleaſure againſt the partition treaty. The earls of Portland and Oxford, the lords Somers and Hallifax, by whoſe advice the treaty was ſuppoſed to have been concluded, were impeached by the commons; but the upper houſe declared the impeachments null and void. This exaſperated the commons, and the moſt alarming animoſities betweed the two houſes ſucceeded.

The whigs now determined to exert their whole power againſt the tory parliament, who were become obnoxious to the people. They openly charged them with being penſioners to the French king, whoſe intereſt they eſpouſed on all occaſions. They repreſented them as implacable enemies to the preſent government; and that all their views and actions tended ultimately to the reſtoration of the abdicated king and his family. They even endeavoured to procure petitions from the city of London, and ſeveral of the principal counties of England, to expreſs their diſapprobation of the proceedings of the commons, and the preſent miniſtry; flattering themſelves with being able, by that means, to procure a revolution in favour of their own party. They, however, failed in general; the county of Kent alone would be prevailed upon to ſend up a petition to parliament: it was conceived in the following terms:

"We the gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter-ſeſſions of the peace at Maidſtone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous eſtate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and conſidering that the fate of us, and our poſterity, depends upon the wiſdom of our repreſentatives in parliament; think ourſelves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable houſe the conſequences, in this conjuncture, of your ſpeedy reſolutions and moſt ſincere endeavour to anſwer the great truſt repoſed in you by our country.

"And in regard that, from the experience of all ages, it is manifeſt that no nation can be great or happy without union; we hope that no pretence whatever ſhall be able to create a miſunderſtanding among ourſelves, or the leaſt diſtruſt of his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe great actions for this kingdom are writ in the hearts of his ſubjects, and can never, without the blackeſt ingratitude, be forgot.

"We moſt humbly implore this honourable houſe to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and ſafety may be effectually provided for; that your royal addreſſes may be turned into bills of ſupply; and that his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe propitious and unblemiſhed reign over us we pray God long to continue, may be enabled powerfully to aſſiſt his allies before it is too late."

This petition, which was ſigned by the deputy-lieutenants of the county, ſeveral juſtices of the peace, and all the grand jury and other freeholders, was boldly delivered to the houſe of commons by David Polhill, William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, Juſtinian Champney, and William Hamilton, Eſqrs. The houſe was immediately in a flame: the petition was voted to be a ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious libel, calculated to deſtroy the conſtitution of parliaments, and to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed government of theſe kingdoms. It was, at the ſame time, ordered, that the five perſons who had preſented it to the houſe ſhould be taken into cuſtody.

This tyrannical exertion of power raiſed a great ferment in the nation, and the moſt indecent reflections were publiſhed againſt the Tories. Among the reſt, a memorial appeared, ſigned Legion, againſt the houſe. "The Engliſh (ſaid the memorialiſts) ought no more to be ſlaves to the parliament, than to the king." They promiſed to ſecond him in all his meaſures, to ſet bounds to the exorbitant power of France; and concluded with this remarkable ſentence, "Our name is Legion, and we are many." Theſe complaints of the people were not unuſeful to the king. The commons ſaw their error, and inſtantly altered their meaſures. They preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, wherein they declared they would ſupport him to the utmoſt; and deſired him to engage in ſuch alliances with the emperor, and other powers, as he ſhould think neceſſary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They voted the ſum of one million and a half for the public expences, thirty thouſand ſeamen, and that ten thouſand troops ſhould be ſent immediately to the aſſiſtance of the States-general.

The miſunderſtanding was, however, ſtill ſo great between the two houſes, that it was thought proper to put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament. Accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of June, the king came to the houſe of peers; and having ſent for the commons, they attended with their ſpeaker, who, on preſenting the money-bills, made the following ſpeech to his majeſty:

"Sir, it is with great joy and ſatisfaction that I attend your majeſty at this time, ſince your commons have complied with all your majeſty was pleaſed to deſire at their meeting. They have paſſed the bill of ſucceſſion, which has ſettled the crown in a proteſtant line, and continued the liberty of England, which your majeſty hath ſettled and preſerved. They have paſſed a bill for taking away thoſe privileges which might have proved burdenſome and oppreſſive to your ſubjects. They have given your majeſty thoſe ſupplies, which are more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable your majeſty, when you are abroad, to ſupport your allies, procure either a laſting peace, or to preſerve the liberties of Europe by a neceſſary war."

The king thanked both houſes for the great zeal they had expreſſed for the public ſervice, and their ready compliance with what he had recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the ſupplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preſervation of Europe: and, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills preſented to him, he put an end to the ſeſſion.

The ten thouſand auxiliaries, under the command of the earl of Marlborough, were ordered to embark immediately for Holland; and, after ſettling a regency, his majeſty paſſed over to the continent, where he aſſiſted at an aſſembly of the States. He told them in his ſpeech, "That he always came into that country with joy, but eſpecially in this dangerous conjuncture, becauſe he foreſaw his preſence would be neceſſary for the ſervice of the ſtate: that he hoped to have paſſed the reſt of his days in repoſe and peace, and to have left that ſtate in a flouriſhing condition; but there had happened ſuch great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that he knew not what might be the conſequence: that he could, however, aſſure their High Mightineſſes, that whether things were accommodated amicably, or whether they ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to arms, he perſiſted in the ſame zeal he ever had for their ſervice and proſperity; and could declare, that the whole Engliſh nation were ready to aſſiſt the ſtates, and ſtrongly contribute towards their defence, and to whatever might tend to the common ſecurity."

The ſtates, in their anſwer, which was equally affectionate, told his majeſty, "That they could not omit to thank him for his aſſurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the Engliſh nation, in favour of themſelves and the common cauſe, well knowing how much they might rely upon a people whoſe courage had gained ſo much reputation in the world, and were always of opinion that their intereſts were inſeparable from thoſe of England."

A treaty was ſoon after ſigned between the emperor, England and Holland, againſt France, for recovering the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria; and for the ſecurity of England and Holland, with regard to their commerce and navigation, and of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, as well as a ſafe barrier to the Dutch.

Marlborough, who was not only at the head of the Engliſh army, but alſo appointed plenipotentiary to the ſtates, ſoon convinced the world that his ſuperior talents were equally adapted to war and negotiation, and rendered his appointment at once glorious to his prince and to himſelf. Prince Eugene had already begun the war in Italy, and ſhewed himſelf worthy of the great reputation he enjoyed.

Every method was now made uſe of, both by France and the allies, for increaſing their forces by ſea and land; but, perhaps, a declaration of war might have been deferred till the next ſummer, if an accident had not happened which haſtened the criſis. James II. paid the debt of nature at St. Germains on the ſixteenth of September, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his exile. Lewis, who ſeemed to bid defiance to the ſeveral powers of Europe confederated againſt him, cauſed the ſon of the deceaſed prince to be declared king of England. He could not have taken a ſurer method to unite the Engliſh againſt him. It was in vain that he declared in a manifeſto he publiſhed on this occaſion, that he meant not to violate the treaty of Ryſwick, or to diſturb William in his poſſeſſion of the crown. The Engliſh, already diſpoſed for war, conſidered themſelves as inſulted, and breathed nothing but vengeance. The city of London, and moſt of the counties in England, tranſmitted addreſſes to his majeſty in Holland, declaring their ſenſe of the indignity offered him, and promiſing to ſupport his government againſt the pretender and all his enemies.

The king returned to his Britiſh dominions on the fifth of November, and ſoon after the parliament was diſſolved, and a new one appointed to meet on the thirtieth of December. The reaſon alledged for the diſſolution of this parliament was, that his majeſty might have the ſenſe of the nation at this alarming conjuncture; but it is more than probable, that the chief inducement was that of preventing a revival of the heats and animoſities between the two houſes, as it was feared they might delay the ſupplies neceſſary for the approaching war.

The parliament met purſuant to the proclamation; and though the Whigs had gained an inconteſtible majority, yet Mr. Harley, who was conſidered as the leader of the tory party, was choſen ſpeaker. The next day the king came to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I promiſe myſelf you are met together, full of that juſt ſenſe of the common danger of Europe, and the late proceedings of the French king which has been ſo fully and univerſally expreſſed in the loyal and ſeaſonable addreſſes of my people.

"The owning and ſetting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the higheſt indignity offered to me and the nation, but does nearly concern every man who has a regard for the proteſtant religion, or the preſent and future quiet and happineſs of his country, that I need not preſs you to lay it ſeriouſly to heart, to conſider what future effectual means may be uſed for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and extinguiſh the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and ſecret abettors.

"By the French king's placing his grandſon on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppreſs the reſt of Europe, unleſs ſpeedy and effectual meaſures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real maſter of the whole Spaniſh monarchy: he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and diſpoſes of it as his own dominions; and by that means he has ſurrounded his neighbours in ſuch a manner, that though the name of peace may be ſaid to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniencies of war.

"This muſt affect England in the neareſt and moſt ſenſible manner, in reſpect to our trade, which will ſoon become precarious in all the various branches of it; in reſpect to our peace and ſafety at home, which we cannot hope ſhould long continue; and in reſpect to that part which England ought to take in the preſervation of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity with which the reſt of Chriſtendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded ſeveral alliances according to the encouragement given me by both houſes of parliament, which I will direct ſhall be laid before you, and which, I doubt not, you will enable me to make good.

"There are ſome other treaties ſtill depending, which ſhall likewiſe be communicated to you as ſoon as perfected.

"It is fit I ſhould tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament: All matters are at a ſtand till your reſolutions are known, and therefore no time ought to be loſt.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's bleſſing, to ſecure to you and your poſterity, the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourſelves, but will exert the ancient vigour of the Engliſh nation; but I tell you plainly my opinion is, if you do not lay hold of this occaſion, you have no reaſon to hope for another.

"In order to do your part it will be neceſſary to have a great navy, and to provide for the ſecurity of our ſhips in harbour; and alſo that there be ſuch a force at land, as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

"I do recommend theſe matters to you with that concern and earneſtneſs which their importance requires: at the ſame time I cannot but preſs you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preſerved, but by keeping ſacred that maxim, that they ſhall never be loſers who truſt to parliamentary ſecurity.

"It is always with regret when I do aſk aids of my people; but you will obſerve that I deſire nothing which relates to any perſonal expence of mine: I am only deſiring you to do all you can for your own ſafety and honour, at ſo critical and dangerous a time; and am willing that what is given ſhould be wholly appropriated to the purpoſe for which it is intended.

"And ſince I am ſpeaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before you, and alſo gave my aſſent to ſeveral bills for ſtating and examining the public accounts, that my ſubjects might have the ſatisfaction to know how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any other way or examination, that it may appear whether there have been any miſapplications and miſmanagements, or whether the debt that remains upon us has really ariſen from the ſhortneſs of ſupplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you how neceſſary diſpatch will be for carrying on that great public buſineſs, whereon our ſafety, and all that is valuable to us, depends. I hope what time can be ſpared will be employed about thoſe other very deſirable things I I have recommended from the throne; I mean the forming ſome good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the ſuppreſſion of vice.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of diſputes and differences, and reſolved to act with a general and hearty conſent, for promoting the common cauſe, which alone can make this a happy ſeſſion.

"I ſhould think it as great a bleſſing as could befall England, if I could find you as much inclined to lay aſide thoſe unhappy and fatal animoſities, which divide and weaken you, as I am diſpoſed to make all my ſubjects ſafe and eaſy as to any, even the higheſt offence committed againſt me.

"Let me conjure you to diſappoint the only hopes of your enemies, by your unanimity. I have ſhewn, and will always ſhew, how deſirous I am to be the common father of all my people. Do you, in like manner, lay aſide parties and diviſions: let there be no other diſtinction heard amongſt us for the future, but of thoſe who are for the proteſtant religion and the preſent eſtabliſhment, and of thoſe who wiſh for a popiſh prince and a French government.

"I will only add this, if you do in good earneſt deſire to ſee England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the proteſtant intereſt, it will appear by your rightly improving the preſent opportunity."

This truly patriotic ſpeech was received by the nation with great applauſe. Both houſes preſented ſeparate addreſſes of thanks to his majeſty, but agreed in returning him thanks for his ſpeech, and in aſſuring him that they would ſupport his title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and enable him to make good all his alliances for the preſervation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France. Theſe addreſſes were graciouſly received by his majeſty, who expreſſed the ſatisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection. The whole nation in general were ſatisfied with theſe proceedings, and the utmoſt expedition was uſed in completing the armaments for carrying on the war with vigour, both by ſea and land. Forty thouſand men were voted for the ſea ſervice, and the ſame number to make up the complement of the army. The commons alſo voted, that whoever would advance or lend the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervice of the fleet, and fifty thouſand pounds for the preſent ſubſiſtence of the land-forces, ſhould be paid the principal, with intereſt after the rate of ſix per cent. out of the firſt aids granted by parliament.

A. D. 1702. The behaviour of Lewis had ſo highly exaſperated the nation, that both houſes joined in an addreſs to his majeſty, beſeeching him that no peace ſhould be concluded with France till reparation was made to the king and the people by the French monarch. They prepared a bill of attainder againſt the pretender, James's ſon; and another, to oblige all perſons in office to take an oath to maintain the eſtabliſhed government, and the church of England, with a toleration for non-conformiſts. Ten peers proteſted againſt this bill, as appearing to them to impoſe a new obligation, as uſeleſs as it was ſevere.

William, now on very good terms with his parliament, was wholly employed in his great deſigns; and though threatened with approaching death, made preparations for the enſuing campaign, determined to put himſelf at the head of his army. But this he never accompliſhed. His life was drawing to a period, and an accident happened which haſtened the melancholy event. His health had been, for ſome time, viſibly declining; and he had retired to Hampton-Court, where he amuſed himſelf with his favourite diverſions of riding and hunting. As he was taking the air on the twenty-firſt of February, in the park of Hampton-Court, he unfortunately fell from his horſe, and broke his collar bone. He was immediately carried into the palace, where the bone was ſet, and he returned the ſame evening to Kenſington. He ſeemed to be in a fair way of recovery, and on the fourth of March took ſeveral turns in the gallery; but being ſomewhat fatigued, he ſat down on a couch, and fell aſleep. He was ſoon after ſeized with a fever; and, notwithſtanding all attempts to remove his complaint, the diſorder continued to increaſe. He was ſenſible that his end was approaching, and met death with that firmneſs of mind which always diſtinguiſhed him. "I know (ſaid he to his phyſicians) that you have done every thing your art could do to aſſiſt me; but it is uſeleſs, and I ſubmit." He continued ſenſible to the laſt moment, and died about eight in the morning of the eighth of March, in the fifty-firſt year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

William poſſeſſed not the amiable and attractive virtues. He had leſs ſenſibility than policy, and ſollicited popularity only occaſionally. But he had merit ſufficient to diſtinguiſh him from the generality of princes. He was a great general, and often gained more by a defeat than the French by a victory. He had inſpired his troops with a confidence and courage that rendered them ſuperior to all danger and bad ſucceſs: and if his actions be fairly weighed in the balance of reaſon, we ſhall, perhaps, think his merit equal to moſt of the kings that ever filled the Engliſh throne. He was conſidered as a friend in whom the moſt unlimited confidence might be placed by moſt of the powers of Europe. He was indefatigable in buſineſs, and maintained the moſt inviolable attachment to his allies. Under the weight of labour, and in the languor of ſickneſs, he contended with Lewis XIV. and humbled his proſperous power. He was the prop of Germany, and the ſupport of the proteſtant religion. The Engliſh learned from him the ſtrength of their maritime and commercial power. He governed Holland without deſpotiſm, but with a kind of abſolute authority, founded wholly on confidence and eſteem. Theſe are circumſtances more than ſufficient to immortalize his memory. He was no friend to letters. Nurſed in a camp, amidſt the noiſe of battle, he imbibed not the amiable deſire of being the patron of the muſes. Had he been as attentive as Lewis XIV. to encourage genius, he would have enjoyed the ſame encomiums.

ANNE

A.D. 1702. ANNE, princeſs of Denmark, ſecond daughter of James II. aſcended the Engliſh throne on the death of king William, purſuant to the act of ſettlement. The privy-council having been aſſembled during the late king's illneſs, waited on the princeſs immediately after his death, and recognized her title to the throne. She received them with the moſt engaging affability, expreſſed her ſenſe of the great loſs the nation had ſuſtained, and of the heavy burden it brought upon herſelf in particular. But added, that the ſincere regard ſhe had to the religion and liberties of her country, would influence her to leave nothing undone on her part to preſerve them inviolable, to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the government as by law eſtabliſhed. She alſo declared her reſolution to carry on the preparations for oppoſing the exorbitant power of France; and that ſhe would loſe no time in giving her allies the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that ſhe would purſue the true intereſt of England, together with that of the confederates, for the ſupport of the common cauſe.

The whole nation promiſed themſelves a long ſeries of proſperity under the government of this beloved princeſs. Her irreproachable manners, the gravity of her diſpoſition, and her firm attachment to the church, had already rendered her perſon dear to the people. The parliament, which, by virtue of an act paſſed in the late reign, continued ſitting after the king's death, declared the princeſs Anne the lawful queen of theſe realms, and iſſued orders for proclaiming her, which was done with great ſolemnity. On the eleventh of March, the queen went to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, and delivered the following ſpeech to the parliament:

“My lords and gentlemen,

“I cannot too much lament my own unhappineſs in ſucceeding ſo immediately after the loſs of a king, who was the great ſupport, not only of theſe kingdoms, but of all Europe: and I am extremely ſenſible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

“But the true concern I have for our religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line, and

and for the government in church and ſtate as by law eſtabliſhed, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promiſe myſelf will be ſucceſsful by the bleſſing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection, of which you have given me ſo full aſſurance.

“ The preſent conjuncture of affairs requires the greateſt application and diſpatch; and I am very glad to find in your ſeveral addreſſes ſo unanimous a concurrence in the ſame opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

“ I cannot but think it very neceſſary, upon this occaſion, to deſire you to conſider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland, which has been ſo lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and ſecurity of both kingdoms.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I need not put you in mind, that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

“ I rely entirely upon your affections for ſupplying it in ſuch a manner as ſhall be moſt ſuitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ It ſhall be my conſtant endeavour to make you the beſt return for that duty and affection you have expreſſed to me by a careful and diligent adminiſtration for the good of all my ſubjects: and as I know my own heart to be entirely Engliſh, I can very ſincerely aſſure you, there is not any thing you can expect or deſire from me, which I ſhall not be ready to do for the happineſs and proſperity of England; and you ſhall always find me a ſtrict and religious obſerver of my word.”

Pleaſed with this ſpeech from the throne, both houſes joined in a warm addreſs of thanks to her majeſty; and on the fourteenth of March, they voted, that the ſame revenue which had been ſettled on king William, ſhould be ſettled on her majeſty during her life. The queen loſt no time in informing her allies of her reſolution to purſue the meaſures of his late majeſty. She wrote a letter to the ſtates-general, aſſuring them that they ſhould find the ſame readineſs to purſue the meaſures for preſerving the common liberties of Europe, as they would had the life of the late king been extended to a much longer date. Animated by theſe aſſurances, the ſtates renewed their applications to the neceſſary buſineſs for carrying on the war with vigour; and publiſhed the queen's letter, to refute the reports that had been artfully raiſed by the enemy, that the queen would not purſue the meaſures concerted by king William and the confederates. Marlborough arrived at the Hague on the twenty-eighth of March, in quality of her majeſty's ambaſſador extraordinary, and plenipotentiary to their high mightineſſes. He confirmed them in their reſolutions for having recourſe to vigorous meaſures, and animated the league that was formed to humble France.

Perſuaded that the alliance formed by the late king would terminate with the breath of William, Lewis could not refrain his joy when the news of that prince's death reached Verſailles. He immediately ſent credentials to his miniſter at the Hague, with inſtructions for renewing the negotiations with the ſtates, in order, if poſſible, to detach them from the grand alliance. The French ambaſſador accordingly preſented a memorial, offering them the friendſhip of his maſter, and very advantageous terms, if they would agree to a treaty of peace. He added, that he doubted not of their accepting his offer, now they were no longer under the influence of the late king. But, at the ſame time, gave them to underſtand, that if, contrary to his expectation, they refuſed his offers, the forces of his maſter were ready to enter upon action; and they muſt now determine, whether they choſe quiet and liberty, or war and ruin. “ The choice (ſaid he) is in your own power, and I hope you will not ſacrifice the happineſs and tranquillity of your country to foreign intereſts.”

The anſwer returned by the ſtates-general was worthy of a people who were determined to preſerve their liberty. “ We have always (ſaid they) cheriſhed a high eſteem for his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's friendſhip, nor ever done any thing to incur his diſpleaſure; but the alarming preparations for war ſo near on our frontiers, lay us under the neceſſity of putting ourſelves in a poſture of defence, and of aſking aſſiſtance from our allies. You are miſtaken, Sir, if you think we had not as much liberty to debate, and take ſuch reſolutions as were judged neceſſary for our preſervation, in the life-time of his Britannic majeſty, as at preſent. We cannot, indeed, enough deplore our misfortune, in being deprived of his wiſe conduct and councils, whoſe deſerts the republic can never forget; and we are reſolved to follow the ſame principles, and continue the ſame alliances we entered into during his life-time; and make uſe of ſuch other means as God hath put into our hands for maintaining our liberties and religion.”

This ſpirited anſwer put an end to the negotiation. The French ambaſſador returned to Paris, and the ſtates-general applied themſelves, with the utmoſt vigour, for oppoſing the ambitious deſigns of the French monarch. The allies were animated by the declarations of the queen; and the earl of Marlborough, after concerting meaſures for beginning the military operations, returned to England.

When the queen came to the houſe of peers to give the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, among which was that for the better ſupport of her majeſty's houſhold, ſhe told the commons, after returning them thanks for having continued to her the ſame revenue they had ſettled on her predeceſſor, that though it would, in all probability, fall ſhort of what it had formerly produced, ſhe would, nevertheleſs, give directions, that one hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be applied this year to the public ſervice. “ I am willing (ſaid ſhe) to ſtreighten myſelf in my own expences, rather than not contribute all I can to the eaſe and relief of my people.”

The parliament were ſo ſtruck with this generous and unexpected declaration, that both houſes preſented an addreſs of thanks to her majeſty, in which they mentioned her unparalleled grace and goodneſs in contributing, out of her own revenue, to the eaſe and relief of her ſubjects.

It was now warmly debated in council, whether the Engliſh ſhould engage as auxiliaries or principals in the war. The tories, with the earl of Rocheſter at their head, ſupported the former, and the whigs the latter. It was urged by thoſe who thought it moſt prudent to act as auxiliaries only, that in the laſt war, the emperor, and ſome other of the allies, had been very remiſs in furniſhing their quotas, and bringing their troops early into the field, whereby many advantages had been loſt, and the whole burden of the war had been, in a manner, thrown upon the Engliſh, who conſtantly ſupplied their deficiencies; and, from a delicate notion of honour, anticipated their revenues, and mortgaged their country in the quarrel: whereas it would have been otherwiſe, had they acted only as auxiliaries; they would have had nothing more to do than to have ſent their quota of troops; and the burden of the war muſt have been borne by thoſe who were moſt nearly concerned in the quarrel.

This opinion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the whigs, who were now joined by the earl of Marlborough. He obſerved, that the honour of the nation was engaged, on this occaſion, to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed, that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unleſs the Engliſh entered as principals in the quarrel. The majority of the council were of the ſame opinion, and a declaration of war was ordered to be prepared againſt France and Spain.

On the fourth of May, the declaration was publiſhed, liſhed, with the uſual ſolemnities; in which the queen reproached Lewis with interrupting the freedom of commerce and navigation; with having formed a deſign of enſlaving Europe; with having ſeized a conſiderable part of the poſſeſſions of Spain; and with having perſonally inſulted her, by acknowledging the ſon of James II. to be king of England. Theſe charges were all founded on fact, and tended greatly to animate the people againſt the common diſturbers of Europe.

Lord Godolphin was now conſtituted lord high-treaſurer, a poſt his lordſhip had, for ſome time, refuſed, but was at laſt prevailed upon to accept it by the earl of Marlborough, who refuſed to command the forces abroad, unleſs the treaſury was put under the care of Godolphin, on whoſe punctuality, in point of remittances, he knew he could depend. Marlborough being thus ſure of the finances, honoured with the higheſt confidence of the queen, ſecure of the favour of the parliament and people, bleſſed with a capacity equal to his intereſt, of indefatigable activity and invincible courage, made the neceſſary preparations for putting himſelf at the head of the allied army.

Lewis XIV. had now no longer thoſe great miniſters, whoſe talents had ſo greatly contributed to the glory of his reign. His finances were hurt both by the late wars and the extravagant magnificence of his court. His miniſter Chamillard, an honeſt man, but of a narrow capacity, a creature of Madame de Maintenon, had the direction of the military department, a charge much too great for his talents. The reſources of government ſeemed, as it were, in the old age of monarchy, and France found herſelf in a very critical ſituation at the very opening of the firſt campaign.

The emperor and the ſtates-general followed the example of the Engliſh, and declared war againſt France and Spain. The declaration of the former turned principally on the flagrant injury that had been done to the Auſtrian family by the French king's accepting of the will of Charles II. in favour of his grandſon, the duke of Anjou. The ſtates-general obſerved, "That Lewis had long ſince caſt his eyes upon their provinces; that he had twice attacked them by a moſt unjuſt war, in order to open himſelf a paſſage to univerſal monarchy: that he was ſo far from intending to preſerve the peace of Ryſwick, that he aimed only at lulling the allies aſleep, by prevailing upon them to lay down their arms; and, by ruining the commerce of the Dutch, to render them incapable of making any effectual oppoſition to his ambitious deſigns; for that treaty was hardly ratified, before he began evidently to encroach on their trade, the great ſinew of their ſtrength, by openly refuſing the tariff promiſed by that treaty."

Lewis was highly incenſed at theſe declarations, eſpecially that of the ſtates, which he affected to treat with the utmoſt contempt; but did not publiſh his declaration of war till the beginning of July. He exerted all his power to engage the German princes in his intereſt, and was ſo far ſucceſsful, that the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, the two dukes of Wolfenbuttle, Rodolphus and Anthony, were prevailed upon to declare in his favour.

The elector Palatine opened the campaign with the ſiege of Keyſerſwart, a ſtrong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The place was inveſted in the month of April, but not taken till the ſeventeenth of July, occaſioned by the badneſs of the weather, and the overflowing of the Rhine.

Marlborough, who had been appointed generaliſſimo of the allied army, was now at the Hague, regulating the operations of the campaign. Trained up to arms in the military ſchool of the great Turenne, he had more than once received the approbation and thanks of that conſummate maſter in the art of war, for his gallant behaviour. Equally ſkilled in the intrigues of the cabinet and the field, he poſſeſſed the happy art of gaining the hearts of all who were connected with him. Endowed with an exquiſite diſcernment, he always diſcovered the lucky moment, the very inſtant it preſented itſelf, and never failed to take the advantage it offered, either in the field or the cabinet. He thoroughly underſtood the intereſts of the powers he ſerved, and ſeldom failed to penetrate the deſigns of the enemy. Favoured in a particular manner with the confidence of the troops, he was able to avert the impending dangers by his prudence and foreſight, or pluck the wreath of conqueſt from the foe by his courage and preſence of mind.

It is no wonder that a general endowed with all theſe great talents, and who received not from a firſt miniſter the plan of his operations, ſhould be able to ſtop the career of Lewis XIV. and oblige him at laſt to ſue for that peace his arms were unable to command. Marlborough's firſt campaign gained him univerſal applauſe, and confirmed the expectations the allies had formed of his great abilities. He joined the army in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen on the thirtieth of June, paſſed the Maeſe on the ſixteenth of July, and endeavoured to bring the French army, commanded by the duke of Burgundy and marſhal Boufflers, to a general engagement; but this he found impoſſible. The French choſe rather to abandon Spaniſh Guelderland to the diſcretion of the allies, than hazard a battle. They retreated under the cannon of Nimeguen; and the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army merely to learn the method of conducting an engagement, learned nothing but how to avoid one. He returned to court; and Lewis was ſo highly exaſperated at the puſillanimous conduct of Boufflers, that he deprived him entirely of his confidence.

The ſtates-general now requeſted Marlborough to make himſelf maſter of the towns in Spaniſh Guelderland, which would open entirely the navigation of the Maeſe, and on that account be of the utmoſt advantage to Holland. The general readily liſtened to their deſire, and took Venlo, Ruremonde, Stevenſwart, and Liege. The citadel of the laſt, which was taken by ſtorm on the twenty-third of October, was extremely rich, the moſt opulent merchants and others having there depoſited their valuable effects, as in a place of ſafety. No leſs than three hundred thouſand florins in gold and ſilver were found in it, beſides notes for about one million two hundred thouſand florins more, drawn upon ſubſtantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. The whole booty was, in ſhort, ſo conſiderable, that an Engliſh grenadier is ſaid to have received a thouſand louis d'ors for his own ſhare. Boufflers continually retreated before the victorious Marlborough, who now repaired to Holland, and was received at the Hague with every mark of the moſt perfect eſteem.

The late king had planned an expedition for reducing Cadiz, and it was now determined to carry it into execution. Sir George Rooke was appointed admiral of the fleet, and the duke of Ormond commander of the land-forces. The fleet, when joined by the Dutch, conſiſted of fifty ſhips of the line, thirty Engliſh, and twenty Dutch. The tranſports had fourteen thouſand land-forces on board. The fleet ſailed on the firſt of July, and on the twelfth of Auguſt anchored in the bay of Bulls, about two leagues diſtant from Cadiz. The troops were landed on the fifteenth of Auguſt, and ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Rota and Port St. Mary's. The ſtricteſt orders had been iſſued againſt plundering before the forces reached either of theſe places; but it was not in the power of the officers to prevent their hungry and thirſty ſoldiers from forcing the houſes where they expected to find refreſhments. Nor was it long before they made their way to the cellars, which they found ſtored with rich and ſtrong wines. They now became wholly ungovernable, plundered the city, and being joined by the ſeamen, ſent the ſpoil on board the ſhips. They ſtripped the churches and altars of their plate, and the houſes of their treaſure and rich furniture; ſo that the value of the whole was above a million ſterling.

So much time was ſpent at Port St. Mary's, that the garriſon of Cadiz had recovered from their conſternation; while the late exceſſes had ſo highly provoked the Spaniards, that they joined their army from every quarter in great numbers, determined to oppoſe the invaders of their country. The ſeaſon of the year was alſo now ſo far advanced, that the ſhips could not, without the utmoſt danger, continue longer in thoſe ſeas. The troops were therefore embarked, and the fleet ſailed for England.

But though the expedition againſt Cadiz was unſucceſsful, an incident happened which enabled them to perform an action of the utmoſt ſervice to their country. Captain Hardy having been detached, in the Pembroke, to Lagos, a harbour on the coaſt of Portugal, to fetch water for the fleet, was informed that M. Chateau Renauld, with a ſquadron of French men of war, and the Spaniſh galleons, were put into Vigo, a port of Galicia, in Spain, ſituated in the bay of Bayonne. It was immediately determined to attempt to deſtroy this fleet, and they accordingly ſtood towards Vigo. The paſſage into the harbour, which was not more than three quarters of a mile broad, was defended on each ſide with batteries, forts, and breaſt-works; and a ſtrong boom, conſiſting of iron chains, top-maſts and cables, was ſtretched acroſs the entrance. Within this boom were ſeven ſeventy gun ſhips, moored with their broadſides to the entrance of the paſſage.

It was now determined that a detachment of fifteen Engliſh and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ſhips, ſhould be ſent in to deſtroy the enemy's fleet; that the frigates ſhould follow the rear of this detachment; and that the great ſhips ſhould move forward, in order to ſupport them, if their aſſiſtance ſhould be wanted: that the army ſhould be landed, and attack the forts that defended the entrance of the harbour.

The land forces, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men, were accordingly landed, and marched directly to the fort which guarded the entrance of the harbour; and though there appeared about eight thouſand Spaniſh foot between the fort and the hills, they had only a few ſkirmiſhes with the Engliſh, who ſoon made themſelves maſters of the fort, the enemy retiring into an old caſtle or ſtone tower, from which they fired briſkly on the ſhips. But opening the gate to ſally out upon the Engliſh, the grenadiers forced their way into the place ſword in hand, and forced the garriſon, conſiſting of three hundred and fifty men, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

The taking of theſe fortifications greatly facilitated the attempt on the ſhipping. The admiral made a ſignal to weigh ſoon after the land forces were aſhore, and the whole ſquadron ſtood in towards the boom; but when the van was within cannon-ſhot of the batteries, it fell calm, ſo that they were under a neceſſity of coming to an anchor; but a freſh gale ſpringing up ſoon after, they cut their cables, and ſtood directly for the harbour. Vice-admiral Hobſon, in the Torbay, who led the van, crowded all the ſail he could, and ſtood directly againſt the boom, which immediately gave way, and he entered the harbour. The reſt of the fleet were not ſo fortunate. The Dutch admiral and his ſquadron, who laid their ſhips broadſides to the boom, in order to add weight to the ſhock of the Torbay, ſtuck faſt, and they were obliged to cut themſelves a paſſage. The whole ſquadron now entered the harbour, through a terrible fire from the enemies ſhips and batteries, which, however, they ſoon ſilenced. Admiral Hobſon was, however, in the utmoſt danger. He was boarded by a fire-ſhip, but had the good fortune to beat her off, though not till after his ſhip had received ſo much damage, that he was obliged to ſhift his flag on board the Monmouth.

The enemy perceiving that it would now be impoſſible to defend their ſhips againſt the ſuperior power and valour of the aſſailants, reſolved to ſet fire to their own ſhips, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. They accordingly burnt eight ſhips, ſix galleons, and two advice-boats, but ten French men of war and eleven galleons were taken. The Spaniards had, however, ſecured a conſiderable part of their plate, and other rich merchandize, on the appearance of the combined fleet. Near fourteen millions of pieces of eight were loſt in ſix galleons that were burnt, and about half that value brought off by the conquerors. This was a dreadful blow to the enemy, who were thus at once deprived of their ſhips and treaſure.

Admiral Benbow was not ſo fortunate in the Weſt-Indies. He had, for ſome time, protected the trade, with great vigilance and ſucceſs, in that quarter of the world. That brave, but violent man, had incurred the hatred of ſeveral of his officers, which, joined with a daſtardly ſpirit, gave the enemy an advantage they could never otherwiſe have obtained. Benbow's fleet conſiſted of ſeven ſail of the line, and with this force he ſcoured the ſeas of the many privateers that were very injurious to the Engliſh trade. Being informed that M. du Caſſe, a French admiral, with ten ſail of ſhips, was expected at Hiſpaniola, Benbow determined, if poſſible, to intercept him. On the nineteenth of Auguſt, he had ſight of the enemy, and ſoon after began the engagement with three ſhips only; the other four falling a-ſtern, came not within gun-ſhot of the enemy. Had they done their duty, the whole French ſquadron muſt have fallen into their hands. Benbow, however, continued the fight, and ſoon diſabled one of the enemy's ſhips. But du Caſſe perceiving that he was not ſeconded by the reſt of his ſhips, attacked him with the utmoſt fury, and the admiral had the misfortune to have one of his legs ſhattered to pieces by a chain-ſhot. He, however, continued the fight with the ſame intrepidity; but fearing, from the behaviour of his captains, that they would deſert to the enemy, he was obliged to retire to Jamaica. On his arrival, he iſſued a commiſſion to vice-admiral Whetſtone to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. One of them died before the trial; two of them, Kirby and Wade, were convicted, and ſentenced to be ſhot; and the third caſhiered and impriſoned. The queen was no ſooner informed of their behaviour, than ſhe ſent down warrants to all the ſea-ports for them to be ſhot immediately, in order to prevent any applications in their favour. They were ſent to England in the Briſtol; and as ſoon as ſhe came to an anchor in Plymouth-Sound, they were both ſhot, purſuant to their ſentence.

When Benbow received the wound, his captain expreſſed his concern for the misfortune. "I am as ſorry as you, (replied Benbow) but I would loſe every limb I have ſooner than ſee the diſgrace of my country." He ſpoke the real ſentiments of his heart; and was ſo deeply affected by this miſcarriage, that he became melancholy, which, added to the fever occaſioned by his wound, put a period to his life, and deprived the queen of one of the beſt ſea-officers England ever produced.

The parliament was to continue only ſix months after the death of the late king; but her majeſty, before the expiration of that term, thought proper to diſſolve it, and call a new one, which met for buſineſs on the twenty-third of October. The tories had ſo prejudiced the people againſt the behaviour of the whigs, that they had a very conſiderable majority in this parliament; a circumſtance very agreeable to the queen, whoſe partiality for that party was always remarkable. The commons having choſen Robert Harley, Eſq; for their ſpeaker, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with great ſatisfaction I meet this parliament, which I have ſummoned to aſſiſt me in carrying on the juſt and neceſſary war in which we are engaged. I have called you together as early as was conſiſtent with your convenience in coming out of your ſeveral counties; and I aſſure myſelf of ſuch evidences of your affections to me, and your zeal for our common cauſe, as will not only give ſpirit and forwardneſs to our own preparations, but ſuch example and encouragement to our allies, as, by God's bleſſing, cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy.

"I have met with ſo many expreſſions of joy and ſatisfaction in all the counties through which I have lately had occaſion to paſs, that I cannot but look upon them as true meaſures of the duty and affection of the reſt of my ſubjects.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I muſt deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies as will enable me to comply both with our particular treaties and engagements already made, and ſuch others as may be neceſſary for the encouragement of our allies, and the proſecuting the war where it ſhall moſt ſenſibly affect our enemies, and be moſt effectual for diſappointing the boundleſs ambition of France.

"And that my ſubjects may the more chearfully bear the neceſſary taxes, I deſire you to inſpect the accounts of the public receipts and payments; and if there have been any abuſes or miſmanagements, I hope you will detect them, that the offenders may be puniſhed, and others be deterred, by ſuch like examples, from the like practices. I muſt obſerve to you, with ſome concern, that the funds given by the laſt parliament have, in ſome meaſure, fallen ſhort of the ſums propoſed to be raiſed by them; and tho' I have already paid and applied to the public ſervice the hundred thouſand pounds I promiſed to the laſt parliament, yet it has not ſupplied that deficiency.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot, without much trouble, take notice to you of the diſappointment we had at Cadiz. I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprize, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there. But I have had ſuch a repreſentation of diſorders and abuſes committed at Port St. Mary's, as has obliged me to give directions for the ſtricteſt examination of that matter.

"I am earneſtly deſirous, for all our ſakes, that this may prove a ſhort ſeſſion. However, I hope you will find time to conſider of ſome better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of ſo great conſequence to the kingdom. On my part, nothing ſhall be omitted for its encouragement.

"I am firmly perſuaded, that the love and good affection of my ſubjects is the ſureſt pledge of their duty and obedience, and the trueſt and juſteſt ſupport of the throne. And as I am reſolved to defend and maintain the church as by law eſtabliſhed, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; ſo I rely on your care of me. My intereſts and yours are inſeparable; and my endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you all ſafe and happy."

Theſe ſentiments, which every ſovereign ought to cultivate, had the merit of ſincerity; and the addreſſes of both houſes were full of the ſtrongeſt expreſſions of duty, eſteem, and acknowledgment. The addreſs of the commons was remarkable for their prejudice againſt the memory of the late king. The purport of the addreſs was, that the aſtoniſhing progreſs of her majeſty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had retrieved the ancient honours of the Engliſh nation. This expreſſion was very injurious to the memory of William, and therefore occaſioned long and very warm debates in the houſe. The word "retrieved" was particularly objected to, and the word "maintained" offered to be ſubſtituted in its room. But the tories ſupported the expreſſion, and it paſſed by a majority of a hundred voices.

The neceſſary ſupplies were granted. The duke of Ormond and admiral Rooke received the thanks of both houſes for the expedition to Vigo. Marlborough was created a duke, and received the honours he ſo juſtly deſerved. The queen ſettled a penſion upon him of five thouſand pounds a year, and was deſirous it ſhould deſcend to his poſterity. This occaſioned very warm debates in the houſe of commons; and the duke intreated the queen to give up a requiſition which might be injurious to the public; and the commons, in extolling the ſervices of the general, ſaid, they were only afraid of authorizing, by a precedent, an alienation of the crown revenues, which had been extremely diminiſhed by the exceſſive grants of the late reign. They ſecured to the prince of Denmark an annual penſion of one hundred thouſand pounds, provided he ſurvived her majeſty. He was alſo exempted from that clauſe in the act of ſucceſſion, which excluded all foreigners from offices, though they were naturalized; and was created lord high-admiral of England. But the quality of huſband to the queen gave him no authority. Anne reigned alone; and he ſhared in her glory, without acquiring any part of it himſelf.

The tories, who had greatly the majority in the houſe of commons, and were favoured by the queen, carried all before them with the utmoſt violence. Firmly attached to the church of England, they covered their animoſities under the pretence of zeal. Great part of the whigs, though, to all appearance, united with the church of England, at leaſt ſo far as not to ſcruple the ordinary oaths, frequented the aſſemblies of the non-conformiſts, without being deprived of any advantage as ſubjects. The reigning party, inſtigated by the hatred they bore them, were deſirous of excluding them from all employments. They conſidered as a real ſchiſm that occaſional conformity, which, under an appearance of ſubmiſſion, concealed a determined revolt from the orthodox faith. In conſequence of this opinion, a bill was brought into the lower houſe, the preamble to which condemned perſecution, though it ſeemed wholly calculated to promote it. Whoever had taken the oaths for holding a place, and afterwards frequented any of the aſſemblies of the non-conformiſts, became, according to the tenor of this bill, incapable of holding ſuch employment, was liable to pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and five pounds for every day he held his employment, after having been at any ſuch meeting: nor could he hold any other employment till after one whole year's conformity.

The promoters of this bill pretended, that a national church being requiſite, as well for the ſupport of religion as the tranquillity of the ſtate, it was abſolutely neceſſary to maintain it by truſting the civil power in the hands of ſuch only as were faithful to its rules and principles; that it was abſurd to give places of conſequence to a ſet of men whoſe conſciences were too tender to obey the laws, yet hardy enough to violate them; that it is contradictory to common ſenſe to be at the ſame time a conformiſt and a non-conformiſt, and to embrace ſincerely a communion to which they did not accede; and that this bill added nothing to the rights of the church of England, nor took any thing from the rights of toleration paſſed in the late reign.

In oppoſition to theſe reaſons, the opponents of the bill alledged, that the diſſenters were in general well affected to the preſent conſtitution; that in the laſt and greateſt danger to which the church was expoſed, they zealouſly ſupported her againſt all the papiſts, their common enemies, and have ever ſince continued to ſhew every mark of affection and ſubmiſſion to the government, in church and ſtate; that to lay any real hardſhip upon them, or give riſe to jealouſies and fears at ſuch a juncture, might be attended with dangerous conſequences: that toleration had greatly contributed to the ſafety and reputation of the church; and plainly proved, that liberty of conſcience and gentle meaſures were the moſt effectual means for increaſing the votaries of the eſtabliſhed religion, and diminiſhing the number of diſſenters: that the non-conformiſts could not properly be termed ſchiſmatics, without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not only tolerated ſuch ſchiſm, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were even more ſevere than thoſe impoſed by law upon the papiſts for aſſiſting at the moſt ſolemn act of their religion; and, that toleration and tenderneſs had always been productive of peace and union, while perſecution and violence had never failed to excite diſcord, and extend ſuperſtition.

Theſe arguments were not, however, ſufficient to induce the tories to lay the bill aſide: they ſupported it with all their intereſt, and the bill paſſed the lower houſe by a conſiderable majority. It was different in the houſe of peers, where many of the members were in the whig intereſt. A very warm debate enſued on the firſt reading, and ſeveral amendments were made to it, namely, that jacobite meetings ſhould be included; that the one hundred pounds penalty ſhould be reduced to twenty, and that the whole incapacitating clauſes ſhould be omitted. They alſo ſhortened the terms for information and proſecution, and exempted the diſſenters from holding offices for which they could not be qualified without taking the ſacrament, provided the act did not extend to univerſity churches, to thoſe of the French and Dutch, or to the governors of hoſpitals, or the aſſiſtants of corporations. Theſe amendments were refuſed by the commons, and ſeveral conferences between the two houſes were held on the occaſion; but as the lords perſiſted in adhering to their amendments, and the commons in refuſing them, the conferences broke up, and both parties publiſhed their proceedings, in vindication of their conduct. The whole intereſt of the court was exerted on this occaſion, but the bill was rejected by one voice only.

A. D. 1703. The convocation had been ſummoned to meet with the new parliament, but no buſineſs of importance was tranſacted, the diſputes between the two houſes preventing their taking notice of any thing that required their attention. The whole body of the clergy ranged themſelves into two different parties, diſtinguiſhed by the appellations of "High Church" and "Low Church." The former accuſed the latter of being preſbyterian hypocrites, and the latter branded the former with being partizans of tyranny and perſecution.

Theſe diſputes induced the queen to prorogue the parliament. Accordingly her majeſty came to the houſe of peers on the twenty-ſecond of February; and, after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, ſhe put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe thanked them for the diſpatch they had given to the public affairs, for the large ſupplies they had given, and for the proviſion they had made for the prince. She told them ſhe hoped the diſſenters would reſt ſatisfied with the act of toleration, which ſhe was reſolved to maintain; that the members of the church would remember ſhe had been educated in their principles, and had been expoſed to great difficulties for maintaining them, and therefore they might be aſſured ſhe would make it her peculiar care to encourage and maintain the church, and tranſmit it, ſecurely ſettled, to poſterity. She thought ſome farther laws were neceſſary for reſtraining the licentiouſneſs of the preſs, and hoped they would endeavour to ſuppreſs pernicious libels; but above all, ſhe recommended union among themſelves; and concluded with acquainting them, that ſhe would apply her ſhare of the prizes taken during the war to the public ſervice.

Scotland was ſtill full of troubles and diſputes; and it was feared the contagion would be propagated in England. The queen, deſirous of putting an end to all diſputes between England and Scotland had made an attempt to unite the two kingdoms, and an act of parliament was paſſed for that purpoſe. But though the Scots acknowledged her authority, and ſwore obedience, they ſeemed averſe to the project. They gave inceſſant inſtances of their inquietude, jealouſy, and the animoſity of parties, during a long ſeſſion of their parliament. The ancient genius of the nation ſhewed its turbulent activity. Bills followed bills without number; the ſpirit of party had infected all their deliberations. One Fletcher, a furious and intrepid republican, aſſerted, that Scotland would be enſlaved if ſhe ſubmitted to the ſucceſſor of the crown of England without previouſly eſtabliſhing ſuch conditions of government as might ſerve her as a rampart againſt the Engliſh miniſtry. The conditions he propoſed for the queen's ſucceſſors were, That all places civil and military, together with all penſions ſhould be conferred by parliament; that the preſident ſhould be choſen by the aſſembly; that during the receſs of parliament a committee of thirty-ſix members ſhould have the adminiſtration of government under the prince, ſhould act in quality of his council, and be accountable to the parliament of Scotland. He alſo propoſed that the ſucceſſor ſhould be elected by a majority of voices; and declared he would rather nominate a papiſt with theſe conditions, than a good proteſtant without them. Theſe propoſitions, however extravagant they may appear, were ſupported by a ſtrong party in the Scottiſh parliament, and they were reduced into the form of a bill. Fletcher had many imitators and many friends. The cry of liberty, and invective againſt the miniſter echoed from every part of the houſe. At laſt the queſtion was put whether they ſhould take into conſideration the ſupplies, or the ſtate of the nation. One of the members ſaid, that all the fruit of the labours and expences of the nation was only to burden them with freſh ſupplies, and bend their necks to the yoke of ſervitude. Another added that their liberties were deſtroyed, and that the privileges of parliament would ſoon ſhare the ſame fate; but that he would defend his own rights at the hazard of his life, and rather die a freeman than live a ſlave. The duke of Queenſberry, the queen's commiſſioner, oppoſed the deliberations on Fletcher's bill. This exaſperated the party ſtill more, and the earl of Roxborough declared, that if there were no other means of obtaining a right ſo eſſential to parliament, it ſhould be ſought by the ſword. The whole houſe was now in the higheſt ferment, and the duke of Queenſberry in the utmoſt danger of being cut to pieces. He however appeaſed the ſtorm by promiſing, that in the firſt ſeſſion of parliament they ſhould purſue their meaſures in favour of liberty. He took advantage of this interval of quiet, and prorogued the parliament.

The duke of Ormond had lately been appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Rochford, who choſe to reſign his poſt rather than reſide in that kingdom. Ormond was reſpectable for his merit and generoſity, but too much addicted to pleaſure, too fond of popular applauſe, and ſurrounded by a number of ſubalterns, whoſe intereſted conduct eſcaped his vigilance. The principal ſubjects of complaint were malverſation and rapine. Great zeal was however ſhewn for the eſtabliſhed government, and an act was paſſed againſt the papiſts, who were ſuſpected to having formed freſh deſigns in favour of the pretender. The commons alſo voted the neceſſary ſupplies, and granted one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds to make good the deficiences of the neceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment. They alſo voted a proviſion for the half-pay officers; aboliſhed penſions amounting to ſeventeen thouſand pounds a year as unneceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment; and paſſed an act for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, according to a form ſent over from England for that purpoſe.

In the mean time the greateſt preparations were making for the enſuing campaign. It had been agreed that the archduke Charles, ſon to the emperor, ſhould aſſume the title of king of Spain, demand the infanta of Portugal in marriage, and with the aſſiſtance of the maritime powers, undertake ſome enterprize of importance. The emperor had alſo promiſed to ſend ſo powerful an army into the field as to be able to drive the elector of Bavaria from his dominions; but he was ſo dilatory in his proceedings, that the French king broke all his meaſures by ſending a powerful re-inforcement to the elector under the command of marſhal Villars. The imperialiſts were defeated near Donavert; the duke of Burgundy made himſelf maſter of Old Briſac; Tallard took Landau, and gained a victory over the prince of Heſſe. The emperor, who had now declared his ſon king of Spain under the title of Charles III. trembled for his empire.

The allies were ſucceſsful only where Marlborough commanded; that able general made himſelf maſter of Bon, Huy, and Limbourg. The Dutch general Opdam was defeated by the marſhal Boufflers, near Eckeren. Nor were the naval operations this year ſucceſsful. Hardly any thing was done againſt the enemy. Sir George Rooke, indeed, in a cruiſe to the bay of Biſcay took a French Eaſt India ſhip, worth an hundred thouſand pounds, a man of war of thirty-ſix guns, and a Weſt-India merchantman worth forty thouſand pounds. But having been for ſome time in an ill ſtate of health, he returned home, and obtained leave to go to Bath.

Lewis flattered himſelf he ſhould now be able to make ſuch ſucceſsful efforts againſt the allies, as to obtain an advantageous peace, and ſupport his grandſon on the Spaniſh throne. But two incidents happened which ſeemed to wear an inauſpicious aſpect. The duke of Savoy, father-in-law to the young king of Spain, and to the duke of Burgundy, abandoned the cauſe which Lewis had undertaken to ſupport, as well as the intereſt of his two ſons-in-law, and joined the allies. The offers made him by the houſe of Auſtria, and the promiſes of money from England, induced him to take this unexpected reſolution. The ſame intereſted motives prevailed upon the king of Portugal to declare in favour of the archduke and join the grand alliances.

On the ninth of November, the queen opened the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I have called you together, as ſoon as I thought you could conveniently come out of your counties, that no time might be loſt in making our preparations for carrying on the preſent war; in which I do not doubt of your chearful concurrence, ſince you muſt be ſenſible, that on the ſucceſs of it depends our own ſafety and happineſs, and that of all Europe.

" I hope I have improved the confidence you impoſed upon me laſt year to your ſatisfaction, and the advantage of us and our allies, by the treaty with the king of Portugal, and the declaration of the duke of Savoy, which, in a great meaſure may be imputed to the chearfulneſs with which you ſupported me in this war, and the aſſurance with which you truſted me in the conduct of it. And we cannot ſufficiently acknowledge the goodneſs of Almighty God, who is pleaſed to afford us ſo fair a proſpect, as we now have, of bringing it to a glorious and ſpeedy concluſion.

" I muſt therefore deſire you, gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as ſhall be requiſite to defray the neceſſary charge of the war in the next year, with regard not only to our former engagements, but particularly to our alliance lately made with the king of Portugal, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the houſe of Bourbon, and reſtoring it to the houſe of Auſtria; which treaty being in itſelf of the higheſt importance imaginable, and requiring all poſſible diſpatch in the execution of it, has neceſſarily occaſioned a great expence, even in the preſent year; though not ſo much as it will require, and for which, I hope, we ſhall be amply recompenſed in the next.

" The ſubſidies which will now be immediately required for the aſſiſtance of the duke of Savoy, will likewiſe occaſion a farther neceſſary charge.

" I muſt take notice to you, that no particular proviſion was made in the laſt ſeſſion, either for the charge of our preſent expedition to Portugal, or for that of the augmentation of troops deſired by the ſtates-general; yet the funds given by parliament have held out ſo well, and the produce of the prizes has proved ſo conſiderable, that you will find the public will not be in debt by reaſon of either of theſe additional ſervices.

" I may further obſerve to you, that though the funds for the civil government are diminiſhed by the war, I have, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, contributed, out of my own revenue, towards ſome public ſervices, and particularly the ſupport of the circle of Suabia, whoſe firm adherence to the intereſt of the allies, under the greateſt preſſures, well deſerved our ſeaſonable aſſiſtance. And I ſhall ſtill be careful not to engage myſelf in any unneceſſary expence of my own, that I may have the more to ſpare towards the eaſe of my ſubjects.

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I heartily wiſh ſome eaſy and leſs chargeable method could be found out for the ſpeedy and effectual manning the fleet.

" I muſt recommend to you to make ſome regulation for preventing the exceſſive price of coals. I have examined this matter, and taken particular care to appoint convoys for that ſervice; but the price has not been in the leaſt abated, notwithſtanding a conſiderable quantity has been imported ſince that time. This gives great ground of ſuſpicion there may be a combination of ſome perſons to enrich themſelves at the general oppreſſion of others, and particularly the poor. It will deſerve your conſideration, how to remedy this great inconvenience.

" And in all our affairs, I muſt recommend as much diſpatch as the nature of them will admit. This is neceſſary to make our preparations early; on which, in a great meaſure, depends the good ſucceſs of all our enterprizes. I want words to expreſs to you my earneſt deſire of ſeeing all my ſubjects in perfect peace and union among themſelves. I have nothing ſo much at heart as their general welfare and happineſs. Let me therefore deſire you all, that you would carefully avoid any heats or diviſions, that may diſappoint me of that ſatisfaction, and give encouragement to the common enemies of our church and ſtate."

The admonition at the cloſe of this ſpeech was generally thought to regard the occaſional conformity bill. The commons, however, determined not to loſe ſight of their favourite ſcheme, and the bill was revived early in the ſeſſion, but with ſome mitigation in the penalties. It paſſed the commons by a conſiderable majority, but was rejected by twelve voices by the lords.

While the parliament was engaged in deliberating on this bill, the moſt dreadful tempeſt happened that had been known in the memory of man. The violence of the ſtorm was confined to the ſouthern parts of England, where the damage was very great. It began on the twenty-ſeventh of November, and the wind was ſo violent that ſeveral houſes in London were blown down, and the whole city ſo dreadfully ſhaken, that the inhabitants expected to be buried under the ruins of the buildings. The greater part of our navy was then at ſea, a circumſtance that filled the nation with terror. And had not the fury of the ſtorm happened at high-water the loſs might have proved fatal to the nation. Fourteen or fifteen men of war was loſt, and near fifteen hundred ſeamen periſhed. Several merchant ſhips were alſo caſt away.

The commons immediately preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, expreſſing their ſenſe of this national calamity, and that they would not ſuffer any diminution in the royal navy, and would therefore make immediate proviſion for repairing the loſs occaſioned by the late ſtorm, and beſought her majeſty to give orders for building ſuch capital ſhips as ſhe ſhould think proper, aſſuring her that the houſe would effectually make good the expence.

When the treaty with Portugal was concluded, it was determined to ſend the archduke into that kingdom, in order to attempt to dethrone the duke of Anjou, and ſeize the crown, which he claimed as his right. A fleet was accordingly fitted out to convoy him to Liſbon, under the command of Sir George Rooke. The prince landed in England about the middle of December, and ſoon after embarked with a conſiderable number of Engliſh and Dutch troops. At his arrival at Liſbon he was received with all the external marks of ſatisfaction.

A. D. 1704. Notwithſtanding the loſs of the occaſional conformity bill had occaſioned great diſſenſions between the two houſes, they were unanimous in granting the neceſſary ſupplies to her majeſty for carrying on the war with vigour, and enabling her to fulfil all the conditions of the treaties ſhe had ſigned with foreign powers. They were ſo deſirous of defeating the ambitious deſigns of France, that they reſolved to maintain ninety thouſand men by ſea and land.

The heats between the lords and commons were hardly ſubſided, when an account of a plot in favour of the pretender, raiſed once more the flame higher than ever. Several perſons concerned in this ſcheme being apprehended, the peers took upon them the buſineſs of trying the priſoners. This gave the commons offence; and embraced the opportunity of giving vent to that animoſity, they had for a ſhort time concealed. They repreſented to the queen their aſtoniſhment that the peers ſhould violate the laws and wound the prerogative, by taking upon them the trial of the priſoners arreſted by order of her majeſty. They aſſured her of their readineſs to ſupport her prerogative, and oppoſe every attempt that might be made againſt her perſon. This addreſs irritated the upper houſe. They declared it injurious, contrary to the rules of parliament, and pregnant with conſequences deſtructive of the liberties and conſtitution of the kingdom. They farther declared, that they had an inconteſtible right to try ſtate criminals, whether priſoners or not: and ſupported this claim by a number of precedents. But all bodies of men are jealous of their privileges; and the commons, who had formerly, on the ſame account, contended with their princes, now made them matter of conteſt with the nobility. The lords, on their part did not fail to mortify the commons.

While theſe diſputes continued between the two houſes, her majeſty ſent a meſſage to the commons, in which ſhe told them, That having taken into her ſerious conſideration the mean and inſufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, ſhe had remitted the arrears of the tenths to the ſaid poor clergy; that ſhe would grant her whole revenue ariſing from the firſt-fruits and tenths, as far as it ſhould become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the houſe of commons could find any methods by which her good intentions to the poor clergy could be rendered more effectual; it would be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majeſty.

Upon receiving this meſſage the commons addreſſed the queen, expreſſing their thanks for her gracious meſſage, and her pious concern for increaſing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue; and aſſured her majeſty they would do their utmoſt to make her majeſty's charitable intentions more effectual. Accordingly a bill was brought in "for making more effectual her majeſty's gracious intentions for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, by enabling her majeſty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the firſt-fruits and tenths." They alſo repealed the ſtatute of mortmain ſo far, as to give free liberty to all men, either by deed or their laſt wills, to give what they thought proper towards the augmentation of benefices. This part of the bill was ſtrongly oppoſed in the houſe of lords, where it was alledged it would be opening a door for the clergy to practiſe on the weakneſs of dying men. This argument was not, however, ſtrong enough to gain over the majority: the bill paſſed both houſes, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

The queen exerted herſelf, to bring about a reconciliation between the two houſes, but in vain. Their animoſities did not indeed hinder the more eſſential buſineſs of the nation; but as it was feared they might be productive of very fatal conſequences, the queen determined to put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament, which was accordingly done on the third of April, when her majeſty, after thanking them for the large ſupplies they had granted, and the diſpatch they had given to the public buſineſs, ſhe added, "At the opening of this ſeſſion, I earneſtly expreſſed my deſires of ſeeing you in perfect union among yourſelves, as the moſt effectual means immaginable to diſappoint the ambition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and laſting peace. And though this has not met with the ſucceſs I wiſhed and expected, yet being fully convinced that nothing is ſo neceſſary to our common welfare, I am not diſcouraged from perſiſting in the ſame earneſt deſires, that you would go down into your ſeveral counties ſo diſpoſed to moderation and unity as becomes all thoſe who are joined in the ſame religion and intereſt.

"This I am perſuaded will make you ſenſible, that nothing, next to the bleſſing God, can ſo much contribute to our ſucceſs abroad and our ſafety at home."

The affairs of Scotland gave her majeſty equal uneaſineſs. In order to ſettle the ferments in that kingdom, where the thirſt of independence was grown outrageous, ſhe conſented to an act of ſurety, which had paſſed the Scottiſh parliament. The purport of this act was, that in caſe the queen died without iſſue, the parliament ſhould immediately aſſemble and nominate a ſucceſſor to the crown, diſtinctly from the crown of England, unleſs a national eſtabliſhment, conformable to the laws of the country, and independent of the Engliſh councils previouſly took place, and the court had not given the people a power to arm in their defence. Lord Godolphin, then prime-miniſter, adviſed her majeſty to yeild, on this occaſion, to the neceſſity of circumſtances; though by this proceeding he expoſed himſelf greatly to the cenſure of the Tories.

The affairs of the emperor were now in a deplorable ſituation. Preſſed on one ſide by the Hungarians who had ſhaken off the yoke, and under prince Ragotſki, were fighting for their liberty; and on the other by the elector of Bavaria, who held every thing upon the Danube, and threatened Vienna itſelf with a ſiege; he had no other reſource than that of imploring the aſſiſtance of her Britannic Majeſty. The duke of Marlborough ſtrongly preſſed the neceſſity of ſending immediate aſſiſtance to the emperor, and the queen accordingly returned a favourable anſwer to the memorial of that diſtreſſed prince. Marlborough arrived at the Hague about the beginning of May, and repreſented, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to the ſtates-general the danger to which the empire, and even all Europe were threatened, if an immediate check was not given to the French and Bavarians in Germany. The ſtates, perſuaded that it would be bad policy to oppoſe the duke, though they were very deſirous of keeping the army in Flanders, gave their conſent; and Marlborough prepared for carrying into execution the plan he had formed, that of marching into the heart of Germany, and delivering the houſe of Auſtria from impending ruin.

He marched with ſuch expedition that he reached Mildenheim on the tenth of June; where he was viſited by prince Eugene, and the next day by prince Lewis of Baden. A long conſultation was held by the generals, in which it was agreed that prince Eugene ſhould command a ſeparate army on the Rhine, and that the duke and prince Lewis ſhould command alternately. The march was proſecuted with the utmoſt expedition, till they reached the banks of the Danube, near Donawert, oppoſite to the Bavarian lines, where about eight thouſand French and as many Bavarians lay intrenched to guard the country they had conquered. Alarmed at the approach of the allies, the duke of Bavaria ſent a detachment of his beſt troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was poſted at Schellenberg, a riſing ground on the Danube, near Donawert. As that poſt was of very great importance, d'Arco had, for ſome time, employed his troops in throwing up entrenchments. Marlborough knowing his works were not completed, reſolved, if poſſible, to drive the enemy from their poſt. Accordingly, on the ſixth of July, at three in the morning, he advanced at the head of a detachment of ſix hundred foot, thirty ſquadrons of Engliſh and Dutch, and three battalions of imperial grenadiers, the reſt of the army following with the greateſt diligence. But the diſtance, badneſs of the road, and other incidents, ſo greatly retarded his march, that it was three in the afternoon before the artillery paſſed the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert.

The attack was now begun, with the utmoſt intrepidity, by the Engliſh and Dutch, before the Imperialiſts could come up. The enemy made a gallant reſiſtance; but prince Lewis leading up the Imperialiſts, the entrenchments were forced; a terrible ſlaughter enſued; and the greater part of the enemy puſhed into the Danube, where numbers of them periſhed. The victory was complete; and the troops that had the good fortune to reach the oppoſite ſide of the Danube, fled in the utmoſt confuſion. Sixteen pieces of cannon and thirteen ſtandards were taken. Donawert immediately ſurrendered; and the elector of Bavaria, informed of the defeat of his troops, repaſſed the Danube, marched with the utmoſt precipitation, and encamped under the cannon of Augſburg. He was offered very advantageous terms, provided he would abandon the French intereſt, and join the grand alliance. At firſt the elector ſeemed to liſten to the propoſal; but being informed that marſhal Tallard had paſſed the Black Foreſt, and was advancing, by forced marches, to his aſſiſtance, he broke off the negotiation, declaring, that ſince the French monarch made ſuch powerful efforts to ſupport him, he thought himſelf obliged in honour to remain firm to his alliance. This conduct of the elector was highly reſented by the confederate generals, who detached thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons to lay waſte the country of Bavaria, to the very walls of its capital.

Eugene exerted all his vigilance to prevent marſhal Tallard from joining the duke of Bavaria, but could not ſucceed. The junction was made at Bibarach, near Ulm, about the end of July. Marlborough immediately left his camp, and joined prince Eugene at Munſter; while prince Lewis of Baden formed the ſiege of Ingoldſtadt. On the twelfth of Auguſt, Marlborough and Eugene reconnoitred the camp of the enemy, whom they found advantageouſly poſted on a hill near Hochſtet, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim; their left by the village of Lutzingen; and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were ſteep, and the bottom very marſhy.

This advantageous ſituation did not, however, intimidate theſe two great generals: they reſolved to attack the enemy before they had time to fortify their camp; advice having been received that Villeroy was on his march for Wirtemberg, in order to deſtroy that country, and cut off the communication of the allies from the Rhine, which muſt have been attended with very fatal conſequences, could it have been effected. Orders were therefore iſſued that very night for all the baggage of the army to be ſent towards Donawert, and the troops ready to march by break of day. About ſeven in the morning of the thirteenth of Auguſt, the allies appeared in ſight of the enemy's camp, where every thing was in a profound ſilence; not imagining the allies would dare to attack them in ſo advantageous a poſt. They were therefore thrown into the utmoſt confuſion at the appearance of our troops: they diſcharged two pieces of cannon to call in their foraging parties, and ſet fire to ſeveral ſmall villages that were between them and the allied army. About nine in the morning, the cannonading on both ſides began, and continued, without intermiſſion, till one in the afternoon.

The French and Bavarian armies conſiſted of near ſixty thouſand men. The right wing was commanded by marſhal Tallard, and the left by the elector of Bavaria, aſſiſted by Marſin. The confederate army did not exceed fifty thouſand men. Prince Eugene commanded on the right; the lords Cutts and Orkney, the generals Churchill, Lumley, and Ingoldſby, the left; while Marlborough took his poſt in the center, as commander of the whole.

Such was the ſituation of the two armies when the battle began about one in the afternoon. There was a neceſſity for croſſing the rivulet already mentioned before the allies could attack the enemy, who had taken care to guard it with three ſquadrons of horſe, under the command of M. de Zurlauben, a Bavarian general, who fell ſo vigorouſly on the allies, that they were obliged thrice to give ground; but this handful of men not being properly ſupported, they were ſoon overpowered by numbers, and driven from their poſt. Had the French generals properly ſupported theſe brave troops, the allies would not have found the paſſage of the rivulet an eaſy taſk; but by neglecting this, they committed an error they could never retrieve. Their artillery played very hotly, but did very little execution; and the paſſage of the rivulet was effected in the face of the enemy. As ſoon as the center and part of the right had paſſed the rivulet in different places, they formed on the other ſide, without any interruption from the enemy, who remained quiet on the hills. Marlborough immediately led his troops to the attack of Tallard's cavalry. The French ſtood the ſhock, with great firmneſs, for ſome time; but were at laſt broken, and forced to give way. Tallard flew immediately to the village of Blenheim, where he had poſted twenty-ſeven battallions and twelve ſquadrons. Theſe troops formed a diſtinct army, and kept up a continued fire on Marlborough's diviſion while he attacked the right wing. Tallard having given his orders in the village, haſtened back to the place of action, where the duke, with a body of horſe and ſome battalions of foot between the ſquadrons, was driving the French cavalry before him, and which Tallard could not prevent.

In the mean time, the cavalry of the confederates left wing being now completely formed, aſcended the hill of Lutzingen with aſtoniſhing intrepidity, and charged the enemy's horſe with ſuch fury, that tho' they rallied ſeveral times, they were obliged at laſt to betake themſelves to flight. The victorious Marlborough now forced his way between the two bodies of the French army on one ſide, while the reſt of the generals got between the village of Blenheim, and Tallard's diviſion on the other. In this deſperate ſituation, Tallard flew to rally ſome of his broken ſquadrons; but the badneſs of his ſight completed his misfortune. He miſtook a ſquadron of Heſſians for his own forces, and was taken priſoner, together with many officers of diſtinction.

Prince Eugene had attempted the paſſage of the rivulet at a place where the banks of the ſtream were very ſteep, and the bottom rough and uneven. The leaſt oppoſition on the part of the enemy muſt therefore have rendered his efforts fruitleſs, and have obliged him to retire and ſeek a more favourable ſpot for the execution of his purpoſe; but the enemy made none. He had no ſooner reached the oppoſite bank, than he attacked the left wing, commanded by marſhal Marſin, with the utmoſt vigour. But the imperial horſe behaved very ill on this occaſion; they were ſo intimidated by the conſtant fire of the enemy, that they could not be brought to advance within muſket-ſhot. The Daniſh and Pruſſian troops alſo gave back in the ſame manner; but being at length animated by the gallant example of their officers, they flew to the charge, and exerted themſelves with ſo much vigour, that they put the enemy to flight; and Marſin finding it in vain to make any farther reſiſtance, abandoned Oberklau and Lutzingen, and was purſued as far as the villages of Morſelingen and Teiſſenhoven, whence he retired to Dillingen and Lavingen. The route now became general through the whole French and Bavarian armies: every one fled with the greateſt precipitation; numbers ran headlong into the Danube, and periſhed.

A ſmall part of the infantry was ſaved by the count du Bourg, who retreated over the marſhes of Hochſtet. But the little army cooped up in Blenheim was forgot. It conſiſted of twenty-ſeven battalions and twelve ſquadrons, amounting in the whole to about eleven thouſand effective men, and the beſt troops in France. They were waiting in Blenheim for orders, and knew nothing of the rout of their army till they were ſurrounded by the allies. It was impoſſible for them to make any effectual reſiſtance: the ſtreets were too narrow for them to form; and their own artillery, now in the hands of the allies, would ſoon have decided the conteſt. They therefore thought proper to lay down their arms, and ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

Such was the concluſion of this celebrated action, known in France by the name of the battle of Hochſtet, and in England and Germany by that of the battle of Blenheim. The triumph of the allies was complete. Twelve thouſand men were killed, and fourteen thouſand taken priſoners. The trophies conſiſted of one hundred pieces of cannon, three hundred pair of colours, and an immenſe booty. The loſs of the victors amounted to about five thouſand killed, and eight thouſand wounded.

The duke of Bavaria was obliged to fly, and abandon his country to the conquerors, who penetrated into Alſace, took Landau, and ſcattered terror in every region through which they paſſed. Marlborough ſignalized himſelf in the action, no leſs by his courage than by his military talents. His priſoner, Tallard, complimenting him on having conquered the beſt troops in the world, he anſwered, that his own were certainly better, becauſe they had conquered them. Marlborough received a recompence worthy of his ſervices. The emperor created him a prince of the empire; the ſtates received him with the ſame reſpect as if he had been the ſtadtholder; and his country received him with every demonſtration of joy.

The campaign in Portugal was far from being ſucceſsful. To fight in conjunction with heretics, was conſidered by the Portugueſe as a kind of apoſtacy. It was therefore in vain to hope for ſucceſs: and accordingly, inſtead of making conqueſts in Spain, ſeveral of the towns of Portugal were taken by the enemy. The duke of Schomberg, who commanded the allied army, was ſo enraged at the behaviour of the Portugueſe, that he deſired leave to reſign his commiſſion. His requeſt was granted, and the earl of Galway ſent over to ſucceed him, with eight thouſand Dutch troops, who reached Liſbon the beginning of Auguſt.

The operations at ſea were this year very conſiderable. Sir George Rooke, after landing Charles at Liſbon, cruiſed for ſome time on the coaſt of Portugal; but being requeſted to aſſiſt in executing a deſign on Barcelona, projected by the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, he readily gave his conſent, took on board that prince with a detachment of land forces; but the attempt proving fruitleſs, he croſſed the Mediterranean, and came to an anchor in the road of Tetuan. A council of war was now held on board the admiral's ſhip, where it was determined to make an attempt on Gibraltar, which was known to be ſlightly garriſoned.

The next day the whole fleet got under ſail, and on the twenty-firſt of July came to an anchor in Gibraltar bay. The land forces, amounting to eighteen hundred, with the prince of Heſſe at their head, were landed, about four in the afternoon, on the neck of land to the northward of the town, in order to cut off all communication with the country. A ſummons was now ſent to the governor to ſurrender the town; but he anſwered he would defend it to the laſt extremity. The next morning the cannonade from the ſhips began with the utmoſt fury; and it was ſoon perceived that the Spaniards were driven from the works at the ſouth mole head; on which all the boats of the fleet were manned and armed, and took poſſeſſion of the fortifications. The Spaniards immediately ſprung a mine, which deſtroyed all the fortifications on the mole, killed two lieutenants and forty men, and wounded about ſixty. The ſeamen, however, kept their poſt; and having made themſelves maſters of a redoubt between the mole and the town, they turned the cannon againſt the enemy. A peremptory ſummons was now ſent to the governor, who, on the twenty-fourth in the morning, capitulated, and the prince of Heſſe took poſſeſſion of the place.

The town of Gibraltar being thus reduced, the admiral ſailed again into the Mediterranean, in order, if poſſible, to meet with the French fleet, that had, for ſome time, been lying at Toulon. He diſcovered them on the eleventh of Auguſt, and on the thirteenth they were not above three leagues diſtant, and a little to the weſtward of Malaga. They now drew up in a line of battle, and lay ready to receive him. Their fleet conſiſted of fifty-two ſhips and twenty-four gallies, and the Engliſh of fifty-three ſhips. Sir George Rooke, aſſiſted by the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes, commanded in the center; Sir Cloudeſly Shovel and Sir John Leake led the van; and the Dutch formed the rear.

The battle began about four in the morning, when the van and rear preſſed forward to a cloſe engagement, and ſoon obliged that part of the French line to give way; but the French center ſtood firm, and the fight was maintained with the greateſt obſtinacy till night obliged them to deſiſt. The French took advantage of the night to bear away to leeward; and the wind ſhifting before the day appeared, they were ſeen three leagues at leaſt to windward. Both ſpent the day in repairing the damages they had ſuſtained; and in the night the French ſtood away farther to the northward; nor could the Engliſh bring them again to an engagement, though they followed them for two days for that purpoſe. Though this victory was far from being deciſive, yet the French ſhips received ſo much damage, that they were never after able to engage the Engliſh during the whole war. A ruinous war had exhauſted the reſources of France, and a ſeries of diſaſters threatened her with ruin. The two rear-admirals, Byng and Dilkes, and captain Jennings, commander of the St. George, received the honour of knighthood.

The parliament was opened on the twenty-fourth of October by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein her majeſty obſerved, that the great and remarkable ſucceſs with which God had bleſſed her arms, infuſed an unanimous joy through the whole kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the preſent advantages would enable her to procure a laſting foundation of ſecurity for England, as well as a firm ſupport for the liberties of Europe. She declared, that her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her ſubjects. She expreſſed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loſs of this opportunity; and that there would be no contention among them, but who ſhould do moſt for the public welfare. "Such a temper as this (added ſhe) in all your proceedings, cannot fail of ſecuring your reputation both at home and abroad. This would make me a happy queen, whoſe endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you a happy and flouriſhing people."

Nothing ſo much encourages a paſſion for arms as ſucceſs. The queen found her parliament no leſs ready to grant her ſupplies than to compliment her on the victories ſhe had obtained over the arms of the common diſturber of Europe. Almoſt five millions were voted for the ſervice of the enſuing year.

The meaſures of the Scottiſh parliament, the act of ſurety, and the ſeeds of rebellion ſcattered through the kingdom, inſpired at once apprehenſions and reſentments. The matter was firſt opened in the houſe of peers by lord Haverſham, who obſerved, "that the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion of Scotland had been poſtponed, partly becauſe the miniſtry of that kingdom were weak and divided, and partly from a received opinion that the ſucceſſion was never ſeriouſly and cordially intended by thoſe who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council:" he expatiated on the bad conſequences that might attend the act of ſecurity, which he ſtiled a Bill of Excluſion; "for," ſaid he, "can any reaſonable man believe, that thoſe who promoted that bill, could ever be real friends to the ſucceſſion as ſettled by the Engliſh parliament?" He particularly mentioned that clauſe by which the heritors and burghs were ordered to exerciſe their fencible men every month: he ſaid, "that the nobility and gentry in Scotland were as learned and brave as any in Europe, and that theſe were generally diſcontented; that the common people were very numerous, very robuſt, and very poor; and aſked, who was the man that could tell what ſuch a multitude, ſo armed and ſo diſciplined, might do under ſuch leaders, ſhould they find opportunities ſuitable to their intention? Beſides, added he, I look upon it as of the laſt importance to England, that there ſhould not be the leaſt ſhadow or pretence for a neceſſity to keep up a regular ſtanding army in this kingdom in time of peace." Theſe particulars he earneſtly recommended to the conſideration of the houſe, and concluded his ſpeech with the following words of lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or ſuffer matter of trouble to be prepared, for no man can forbid the ſparks that may ſet all on fire."

A warm debate enſued in the houſe of peers, but the majority agreeing with lord Haverſham, they came to the following reſolutions, "That to prevent the inconveniences that might happen by the late act paſſed in Scotland, the queen might be enabled, on the part of England, to name commiſſioners to treat about an entire union with Scotland, provided thoſe powers be not put in execution till commiſſioners ſhould be named on the part of Scotland, by the parliament of that kingdom: that no Scotſman ſhould enjoy the privileges of an Engliſhman, except ſuch as were ſettled in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the plantations, or ſuch as might be in the ſea or land ſervice, until an union could be effected, or the ſucceſſion ſettled as in England: that the traffic of cattle from Scotland to England ſhould be ſtopped: that orders ſhould be iſſued for ſeizing ſuch veſſels as ſhould be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the parts of any of her majeſty's enemies: that cruiſers ſhould be appointed for that purpoſe: and that the exportation of Engliſh wool into Scotland ſhould be prohibited." On theſe reſolutions a bill for an union with Scotland was brought into the houſe, and being paſſed by the lords, it was ſent down to the commons, received the ſanction of that houſe, and afterwards the royal aſſent.

The duke of Marlborough being returned to England received the thanks of both houſes, for his great ſervices to the nation; and the commons preſented an addreſs to the queen, intreating her to conſider of ſome proper means to perpetuate the memory of ſuch noble actions, particularly the battle of Blenheim. In anſwer to this addreſs the queen informed the houſe that ſhe was willing to part with her manor of Woodſtock and hundred of Wooton to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs. A bill was immediately brought in for enabling her majeſty to beſtow theſe manors on the duke and his heirs. The comptroller of the board of works was alſo ordered by her majeſty to build a magnificent palace for the duke in Woodſtock, and to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Blenheim-houſe.

But Sir George Rooke who had ſpent his life in the ſervice, and who had done great honour to his country, was not only neglected, but diſmiſſed from his command, and ſuffered to retire to his ſeat in Kent; and the command of the fleet beſtowed on Sir Cloudeſley Shovel. So capricious and uncertain are the favours of the great.

A. D. 1705. The good underſtanding that had ſubſiſted between the two houſes was now diſturbed on a queſtion relating to the rights of electing members of parliament. And particularly, whether an elector's vote being refuſed by the officer appointed to take the poll, he might not bring an action at law againſt the offender? Several conferences were held between the two houſes in order to an amicable deciſion of the queſtion; but neither being willing to recede in the leaſt from the principles they had adopted, and the diſputes ſeeming to threaten very ſerious conſequences, the queen determined to put an end to the ſeſſion. Accordingly ſhe came to the houſe of peers on the fourteenth of March, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, and making a ſhort ſpeech from the throne, ſhe prorogued the parliament. On the fifth of April it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new one purſuant to the act for triennial parliaments.

The Scottiſh parliament met on the twenty-eighth of June; but many of the members being abſent, the lord-commiſſioner adjourned the houſe till the third of July, when the queen's letter was read to the aſſembly. She obſerved, "That at their laſt meeting ſhe recommended to them, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, the ſettling of the ſucceſſion of that kingdom in the proteſtant line; and ſeveral particulars having ſince happened which ſhewed the great inconveniency of that matter continuing in ſuſpence, ſhe could not but at preſent moſt ſeriouſly renew the recommendation of that ſettlement, as being convinced of the growing neceſſity of it, both for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, the peace and ſafety of all her dominions, and for defeating the deſigns and attempts of all her enemies. And to prevent any objection to the ſaid ſettlement, that could be ſuggeſted from the views or fears of future inconveniences that might happen to that kingdom from thence, ſhe ſhould be ready to give the royal aſſent to ſuch proviſions and reſtrictions as ſhould be found neceſſary and reaſonable in a caſe of ſuch importance; and therefore ſhe muſt recommend it to them, as the moſt neceſſary for all the ends already mentioned, that they ſhould proceed to the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion before all other buſineſs."

She ſaid, "ſhe was fully ſatisfied, and doubted not but they were, that great benefits would ariſe to all her ſubjects, by an union of Scotland and England, and that nothing would contribute more to the compoſing of differences, and extinguiſhing heats that were unhappily raiſed and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that had a tendency to procure ſo valuable an end; ſhe therefore heartily recommended to them to paſs an act for a commiſſion to ſet a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as the parliament of England had done, for effectuating what was ſo deſirable, and for ſuch other matters and things as might be judged proper for her honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever, in which ſhe ſhould moſt heartily give her beſt aſſiſtance."

The duke of Argyle, high-commiſſioner for Scotland, ſtrongly recommended the meaſures mentioned in the queen's letter to the conſideration of the houſe, and was ſeconded by the lord-chancellor. The affair of the ſucceſſion was accordingly taken into conſideration, when duke Hamilton propoſed that the treaty with England ſhould be firſt diſcuſſed, and the limitations ſettled before they proceeded any farther in the act of ſucceſſion. This was agreed to, and that nobleman made a motion for leaving the nomination of the commiſſioners to the queen. This occaſioned a very violent debate; but the queſtion being at laſt put, Whether the nomination ſhould be left to the queen or the parliament? the duke's motion was approved of by a ſmall majority. A bill was therefore brought in and paſſed by the houſe for treating about an union with England; but it was declared that the treaty ſhould not commence till the clauſe in the Engliſh act of parliament, declaring the ſubjects of Scotland “Aliens,” be reſcinded.

The campaign was not filled with remarkable actions. The imperial army was ſo ſlow in its motion, that the plan laid by Marlborough for puſhing his conqueſts on the Moſelle, was rendered abortive. The French, animated by the abſence of that famous general, did not fail of making uſe of their ſuperiority in the Low Countries; they made themſelves maſters of Huy, and undertook the ſiege of Liege. But Marlborough marched back with ſo much expedition that he ſaved the latter, the enemy retiring at his approach with great precipitation. The duke ſoon retook Huy, and obliged the enemy to retire behind their lines. Marlborough determined to force them, though the French and Bavarians conſiſted of near one hundred battalions and one hundred and forty-ſix ſquadrons. The force of the allied army was nearly equal, conſiſting of ninety-five battalions and one hundred and fifty-nine ſquadrons.

To facilitate this difficult undertaking it was determined to make a falſe attack, in order to divide the attention of the enemy. Accordingly the army, under the command of M. d'Averquerque decamped early in the morning of the ſeventeenth of July, and marched towards Burdine on the other ſide of the Mehaigne. Marlborough made a motion at the ſame time, as if he intended to ſupport Averquerque in his attack of the lines in the neighbourhood of Meſſelin, where they were weakeſt. This feint produced the deſired ſucceſs; the French detached large bodies of forces to theſe parts; leaving the others, where the duke really intended to make his attack, in a very weak condition. As ſoon as the night came on, the duke put his army in motion, while d'Averquerque repaſſed the Mehaigne to join, and both marched in conjunction to ſupport a detachment ordered to make an attempt on the enemy's lines near Heyliſham. This was the ſtrongeſt part of the whole, and conſequently where the enemy leaſt expected an attack. They were therefore ſeized with aſtoniſhment when the allies appeared, and incapable of making any effectual oppoſition, the greater part of their forces having been drawn off to guard the other parts.

But the confederate troops had no ſooner paſſed the lines than they were attacked by twenty-four ſquadrons of Bavarian horſe and twenty battalions; the diſpute was for ſome time very ſharp; but the horſe and dragoons of the right wing coming up, the enemy were put to flight, and all their ſtandards, colours, and cannon, were taken. The French retired under the cannon of Louvain; and the deputies of the ſtates-general having refuſed to concur with a propoſal made by the duke of Marlborough for paſſing the river Yſch and attacking the French in their camp; he accepted of an invitation from the new emperor Joſeph, and ſat out for Vienna; the troops having retired into winter quarters.

Lord Galway had very little ſucceſs this campaign. The Portugueſe never acted with vigour. They took the towns of Valencia d'Alcantara, and Albuquerque. After which they inveſted Bajadox, and would have carried the place had they not been prevented by an unforeſeen accident. Lord Galway being one day examining the trenches, a cannon-ball ſwept away his right arm, and he was obliged to be carried off the field. The ſiege was now puſhed with leſs vigour than before, and the marquis de Theſſe found means to throw a thouſand men into the place. All hopes of reducing Bajadox were now over; the allied army therefore abandoned the enterprize, and marched into winter quarters.

The ſucceſs in Catalonia, however, made up for this diſappointment. Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, and the earl of Peterborough, reduced Barcelona, and the whole province of Catalonia ſubmitted to Charles. A very remarkable incident happened at the ſiege of Barcelona, which does the higheſt honour to the earl of Peterborough. While the viceroy was capitulating with the Engliſh general at one of the gates of the city, a party of German ſoldiers penetrated into the place, and began to pillage the houſes and maſſacre the inhabitants. The viceroy complained of this treachery. Peterborough aſſured him he might depend on his honour, and deſired permiſſion to enter with his troops, promiſing to appeaſe the tumult, and return to finiſh the articles of capitulation. He was truſted, and marched into the city, followed by the Engliſh; where he ſoon put a ſtop to the diſorders, diſperſed the German ſoldiers, took from them their plunder, and returned to ſign the articles of the treaty.

The firſt ſeſſion of the new parliament was opened by her majeſty on the twenty-ſeventh of October, with a ſpeech from the throne; wherein ſhe repreſented the neceſſity of acting vigorouſly againſt France, as the common enemy to the liberties of Europe. She recommended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which, ſhe ſaid, was without example, and merited all their endeavours to encourage him to perſevere in the ſame conduct. She informed them of her intention of iſſuing commiſſions for treating of an union with Scotland. She earneſtly recommended unanimity and brotherly affection among her people; and obſerved, that ſome perſons had endeavoured to foment animoſities, and even to ſuggeſt in print, that the eſtabliſhed church was in danger. “Such (added ſhe) are enemies to me and my kingdom, and mean only to cover deſigns which they dare not publicly avow, by endeavouring to diſtract the nation with unmeaſurable and groundleſs diſtruſts and jealouſies.” She declared ſhe would always affectionately ſupport and countenance the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; that ſhe would inviolably maintain the toleration; that ſhe would endeavour to promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing elſe that had a tendency to make them a happy and a flouriſhing people.” “And they (added ſhe) who ſhall concur zealouſly with me in carrying on theſe good deſigns, ſhall be ſure of my kindneſs and favour.”

Addreſſes of thanks were voted by both houſes, who promiſed to aſſiſt her majeſty to the utmoſt of their power. They alſo voted their thanks to the duke of Marlborough for his eminent ſervices to the queen and nation; and eſtabliſhed the funds neceſſary for carrying on the war with vigour during the approaching campaign.

The next buſineſs that engaged their attention, was the union with Scotland; and the parliament of that kingdom having declared, that they would enter into no treaty with England till the act in which they were declared aliens ſhould be reſcinded, the two houſes immediately repealed that act, and alſo took off the ſeveral prohibitions and reſtrictions which had been laid upon the trade between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1706. Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, which happened on the nineteenth of March, her majeſty appointed commiſſioners for treating of an union between England and Scotland, a treaty ſhe was very deſirous of concluding. Every thing being ready for entering on this important work, the commiſſioners of both kingdoms met on the ſixteenth of April, at the council-chamber in the cockpit, in order to negotiate an agreement that was for ever to put an end to the diſputes that had for ſo many ages ſubſiſted between theſe two ſovereignties.

It was at firſt propoſed by the Scottiſh commiſſioners to conclude a fœderal union like that ſubſiſting between the cantons of Switzerland; but nothing leſs than an incorporating union would ſatisfy the Engliſh, who were determined to take away effectually from the Scottiſh parliament the power of repealing the articles of this treaty. Purſuant to this reſolution, the lord-keeper of England propoſed, "That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhould be united into one nation, by the name of Great-Britain; that it ſhould be repreſented by one parliament; and that the ſucceſſion of the monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhould be ſubject to the limitations mentioned in in act of parliament made in England, in the thirteenth year of the reign of king William III. intitled, An act for the farther limitation of the crown, &c."

The commiſſioners of Scotland finding a fœderal union would not be accepted, agreed to the preliminaries propoſed by the lord-keeper, with this proviſo only, "That all the ſubjects of the united kingdom of Great-Britain ſhould have full freedom and intercourſe of trade and navigation to and from any part or place within the ſaid united kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there ſhould be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom." No objection was made to this proviſo, except a reſerving ſuch particulars as, in the courſe of the negotiation, ſhould appear to be advantageous to the ſubjects of both countries. Theſe preliminaries being ſettled, the queen made them a viſit, in order to quicken their deliberations, and finiſh a treaty ſhe had ſo greatly at heart. They accordingly exerted themſelves, in order to ſatisfy the requeſt of her majeſty; and at laſt finiſhed the negotiation for uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The following is the ſubſtance of the articles that compoſed the treaty of union.

ARTICLES OF UNION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhall, from the firſt of May, 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain; and that the enſigns armorial of the ſame united kingdoms be ſuch as her majeſty ſhall appoint, and the croſſes of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in ſuch a manner as her majeſty ſhall think fit, and uſed in all flags, banners, ſtandards, and enſigns, both by ſea and land.

II. That the ſucceſſion of the united monarchy of Great-Britain ſhall be to the princeſs Sophia, and her heirs; and that all papiſts, or perſons who marry papiſts, ſhall be for ever excluded from inheriting the crown of Great-Britain, agreeable to the proviſion for the deſcent of the crown of England made in the firſt year of the reign of their late majeſties, king William and queen Mary, intitled, An act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, &c.

III. That the united kingdoms of Great Britain ſhall be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, to be ſtiled the parliament of Great-Britain.

IV. That the ſubjects of the united kingdoms ſhall have freedom of trade and navigation within the ſame, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges and advantages, except where it is otherwiſe expreſſed in theſe articles.

V. That all ſhips or veſſels belonging to the Scots [at the time of ratifying the treaty of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland] ſhall be deemed Britiſh built; the owners making oath that [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland] the ſame did, in the whole or in part, belong to them.

VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the ſame regulations of trade, and liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties, except and reſerving the duties upon export and import of ſuch particular commodities, from which any perſon, the ſubject of either kingdom, are eſpecially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the union, are to remain ſafe and entire to them, in all reſpects as before the ſame; and that from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England ſhall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private account, than thoſe duties to which the cattle of England are or ſhall be liable within the ſaid kingdom: and ſeeing, by the laws of England, there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats, ground or unground, are not expreſſed, that from and after the union, when oats ſhall be ſold for fifteen ſhillings ſterling per quarter, or under, there ſhall be paid two ſhillings and ſixpence ſterling for every quarter of the oat-meal exported in the term of the law, whereby and ſo long as rewards are granted for the exportation of grains. And that the beer of Scotland have the ſame reward as barley. And becauſe the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a diſcouragement to tillage, therefore the prohibition now enforced by the law of Scotland againſt importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond ſea, into Scotland, do, after the union, remain in the ſame force as at preſent, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great-Britain, for the diſcouragement of the importation of the ſaid victual from beyond ſea.

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the ſame exciſe upon the ſame exciſeable liquors, except only that the thirty-four Engliſh barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots preſent meaſure, ſold in Scotland by the brewer at nine ſhillings and ſixpence ſterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the union, liable, on account of the preſent exciſe on exciſeable liquors in England, to any higher impoſition than two ſhillings ſterling upon the aforeſaid thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel, being twelve gallons the preſent Scots meaſure.

VIII. Foreign ſalt in England ſhall pay the ſame duty as in Scotland; [but becauſe the duties of foreign ſalt imported, may be very heavy on the merchant importer, that therefore all foreign ſalt imported into Scotland ſhall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon ſalt; and that the merchant may have whatever quantity thereof his occaſions may require, not under a weight of forty buſhels at a time, upon his giving ſecurity for the duty of what quantities he receives, payable in ſix months.] By this article it was alſo provided, that ſalt made in Scotland ſhould be exempted for ſeven years from the Engliſh duty. But from the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſhall be ſubject to the ſame duties as ſalt made in England. [That Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, remain exempted from the duty of two ſhillings and ſixpence on home ſalt, impoſed by an act made in the ninth and tenth year of king William III. and if the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall at, or before, the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſubſtitute any other fund in the place of the ſaid two ſhillings and four-pence of exciſe upon the buſhel of home ſalt, Scotland ſhall, after the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, bear a proportion of the ſaid fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty.] No ſalt whatſoever ſhall be brought from Scotland to England by land under certain penalties denounced: and for eſtabliſhing an equality in trade, it was provided, that all fleſh exported from Scotland to England, and ſhipped in Scotland to be exported beyond ſea; and proviſions for ſhips in Scotland and foreign voyages, may be ſalted with Scotch ſalt, paying the duty for what ſalt is ſo employed, and the like quantity of freſh ſalt pays in England, and under the ſame penalties, forfeitures, and proviſions for preventing frauds as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that for the encouragement of the herring fiſhery, there ſhall be allowed and paid to the ſubjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the preſent allowances for other fiſheries, ten ſhillings and five pence ſterling for every barrel of white herrings which ſhall be exported from Scotland; and that they ſhall be allowed five ſhillings ſterling for every barrel of beef or pork ſalted with foriegn ſalt, without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalts, and exported for ſale from Scotland to parts beyond ſea, alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.

IX. That whenever the ſum of one million nine hundred, ninety-ſeven thouſand, ſeven hundred, and ſixty-three pounds, eight ſhillings, and four pence half-penny, ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, ſhall be charged with the additional ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds, as the quota of Scotland for ſuch tax; and ſo proportionally for any greater or leſſer ſum raiſed in England on land; the ſaid quota to be aſſeſſed in the ſame manner as the aſſeſs now is in Scotland; but ſubject to ſuch regulations as ſhall be made in the parliament of Great Britain.

X. That Scotland ſhall not be charged with the ſtamp-duties now in force in England.

XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

XII. Nor thoſe on coals or culm.

XIII. Scotland ſhall not pay the malt duty during its continuance in England, which was to expire the twenty fourth of June 1707.

XIV. Scotland ſhall not be charged with any other duties impoſed by the parliament of England before the union, except thoſe conſented to in this treaty: and if the parliament of England in their proviſion for the ſervice of the year 1707 ſhall impoſe any farther cuſtoms, the Scots ſhall have an equivalent for the ſhare thereof they may be liable to. [And Scotland ſhall not be charged with any impoſition on malt made or conſumed in that kingdom during the war.]

XV. Stipulates, that whereas by the terms of this treaty, the ſubjects of Scotland, for preſerving an equality, of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to ſeveral cuſtoms and exciſe now payable in England, which will be applicable towards paying the debts of England, payable before the union, it is agreed that an equivalent ſhall be made to Scotland for ſuch part of the Engliſh debts, as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reaſon of the union, other than ſuch appropriations as have been made by parliament in England, of the cuſtoms and other duties on exports and imports, exciſes and all exciſeable liquors, in reſpect of which debts equivalent are herein before provided; which equivalent is here ſtipulated to be three hundred ninety-eight thouſand, eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings ſterling, to be granted by the parliament of England in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained. The diſtinction of this equivalent is in the ſame article applied, 1. For endemnifying private perſons from any loſſes they may ſuſtain by reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of that of England. 2. For endemnifying the ſufferers in the late African and Indian company of Scotland. 3. For diſcharging the public debts of Scotland. 4. For improving the manufacture of the coarſe wool of Scotland. 5. For encouraging and promoting the fiſheries, and ſuch other manufactures and improvements in Scotland, as may moſt conduce to the general good of the united kingdom: and for which end commiſſioners were to be appointed. [It ſeems the Scots were ſo inflamed by the deſtruction of their Darien and African company by the government of England, that nothing but the abſolute aſſurance of an equivalent for reimburſing their whole capital employed in that affair, with intereſt, amounting to two hundred and thirty-two thouſand, one hundred and ſixty-two pounds, ſixteen ſhillings and eleven pence halfpenny, could have induced them to agree to treat of the union, and they even inſiſted on the inſertion of the above clauſe.] That if the ſaid ſtock, capital and intereſt ſhall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the union, that then the ſaid company may from henceforth trade, or give licence to trade until the ſaid whole capital ſtock and intereſt ſhall be paid.

XVI. That the coin be of the ſame ſtandard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland under the ſame rule as the mint of England.

XVII. That the ſame weights and meaſures be uſed throughout the united kingdoms as are now uſed in England; and ſtandards ſhall be kept in the burghs, agreeable to the ſtandard of the Engliſh exchequer.

XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, cuſtom, and ſuch exciſes as Scotland is to be liable to, ſhall be the ſame as thoſe in England. Other laws in Scotland to remain as before the union, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the ſame throughout the united kingdom; but no alteration ſhall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for the evident utility of the ſubjects of Scotland.

XIX. The court of ſeſſion and other courts ſhall remain in Scotland the ſame as before the union, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations, for the adminiſtration of public juſtice, as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that hereafter none ſhall be named by her majeſty or her royal ſucceſſors to be ordinary lords of ſeſſion, but ſuch as have ſerved in the college of juſtice as advocates or principal clerks of ſeſſion for the ſpace of five years, or as writers to the ſignet for the ſpace of ten years, with this proviſion, that no writer to the ſignet be capable of being admitted a lord of ſeſſion, unleſs he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the ſaid office two years before he be named to be a lord of ſeſſion, yet ſo as the qualification made or to be made, for capacitating perſons to be named ordinary lords of ſeſſion, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain.

XX. That all heritable offices, ſuperiorities, heritable juriſdictions, offices for life, and juriſdictions for life, be reſerved to the owners thereof as rights of property, in the ſame manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, this treaty, in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal burghs in Scotland, as they now are, ſhall remain entire after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof.

XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, ſixteen of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the union, ſhall ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, and forty-five of the members of the repreſentatives of Scotland in the houſe of commons in the parliament of Great Britain, the choice whereof to be according to the act paſſed in Scotland for that purpoſe; which act is hereby declared to be valid, as if it were a part of it, and engroſſed in the treaty: and in caſe her majeſty ſhall on the firſt of May 1707, declare this preſent parliament to be the firſt of Great Britain, the preſent parliament of England may be ſo on the part of England, and the ſixteen peers and the forty-five commoners for Scotland to ſit with them; ſuch parliament to continue no longer than the Engliſh parliament is allowed to continue.

XXIII. That the aforeſaid ſixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the preceding article, to ſit in the houſe of lords in the parliament of Great Britain, ſhall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they or any peers of Great Britain ſhall have after the union, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trial of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhall, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence next, and immediately after the peers of the orders and degrees in England at the time of the on, and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degree, who ſhall be created after the union.

XXIV. That from and after the union there ſhall be one great-ſeal for the united kingdom of Great Britain, which ſhall be different from the great-ſeal now uſed in either kingdom; and that the quarter of the arms, as well as the rank and precedency of Lyon king at arms in Scotland, ſhall be left to her majeſty; and that in the private ſeal, ſignet, caſſet, &c. now uſed in Scotland, be continued; but that the ſaid ſeals be altered and adapted to the union, as her majeſty ſhall think fit: that the crown, ſceptre, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and records whatſoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they ſhall ſo remain, in all time coming, notwithſtanding the union.

Such were the articles agreed to and ſigned by the reſpective commiſſioners of England and Scotland. They immediatly waited on the queen with the treaty; and lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the Engliſh commiſſioners, made a ſpeech to her majeſty, congratulating her on the concluſion of a negotiation, which had ſo happily united the different parts of this iſland under the ſame monarchy. The earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor of Scotland, ſpoke to the ſame effect on the part of the commiſſioners of that kingdom; and her majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer.

“ My Lords,

“ I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleaſed to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to ſo good a concluſion: the particulars of it ſeem ſo reaſonable that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wiſh therefore my ſervants of Scotland may loſe no time in going down to propoſe it to my ſubjects in that kingdom; and I ſhall always look upon it as a particular happineſs if this union (which will be ſo great a ſecurity and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accompliſhed in my reign.”

While the miniſters of the two kingdoms were employed in eſtabliſhing an union between their reſpective countries, the armies of the belligerent powers were carrying on their hoſtile attempts with great fury. Lewis XIV. had determined to exert his utmoſt efforts in the courſe of this campaign, and had accordingly ſent very numerous forces into the field. His army in Flanders was commanded by the marſhal de Villeroy, a nobleman of great generoſity and a favourite at court; but an indiſcreet general, blindly confident, and deaf to counſel. He formed the deſign of ſurprizing the duke of Marlborough before he could be joined by the Danes and Pruſſians, who were employed laſt year to act as auxiliaries. The French accordingly paſſed the Dyle early in May, and advanced directly towards the confederate army. It was in vain to hope that it was poſſible to ſurprize ſo vigilant a general as Marlborough. He was well informed of all their motions, and diſpatched an expreſs to the Danes to join him immediately, and was readily obeyed. Before this junction the allied army conſiſted of ſeventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, provided with one hundred pieces of cannon, twenty hawbitzers, and forty-two pontoons. About the ſame time the Danes joined the allied army, that of the French was joined by the marſhal Marſin's horſe, and by this addition their army amounted to ſeventy-ſix battalions and one hundred and thirty-two ſquadrons. This ſuperiority determined Villeroy to give battle to the allied army, though he knew his hopes of ſurprizing the active Marlborough were rendered abortive.

The allies moved forward to meet the enemy, who had now taken poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp of Mont St. André, their right extending to the Mahaigne, and their left to Anderkirk, the villages of Offuz and Ramillies being in the center. On the twelfth of May, about two in the afternoon, the allied army was drawn up in order of battle, with the right wing near Foltz, on the brook Yauſe, and the left near the village of Franquennes, which was occupied by the enemy. The action was begun on the left of the allied army, who puſhed a brigade of foot from their poſt on the Mahaigne. About the ſame time M. d'Auverquerque, the Dutch general, charged the French houſhold troops at the head of the horſe of the left wing. For near half an hour the ſucceſs was doubtful; but a reinforcement coming up, the French retired. Lieutenant Scultz was now ordered, with twelve ſquadrons, and twenty pieces of cannon, to attack the village of Ramillies, which was ſtrongly fortified with artillery. The attack was made with great vigour and reſolution; and the enemy at laſt driven from the village, who endeavouring to make their retreat, were moſt of them killed or taken priſoners.

In the mean time the Dutch and Daniſh horſe of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the foot in the right of the enemy, cut twenty battalions of them to pieces, and made themſelves maſters of their colours and artillery. The French now began to retreat in good order, covered by the cavalry of their left wing; but the Engliſh horſe forcing their paſſage over the rivulet which ſeparated them from the enemy, attacked them with ſo much intrepidity that they entirely abandoned their foot, who were now expoſed to all the fury of the cavalry. The French now gave way on all ſides, and it was not without difficulty that marſhal Villeroy, and the elector of Bavaria ſaved themſelves by flight. An accident which now happened completed the deſtruction of the French army. Several of the waggons of the vanguard happening to break down in a narrow paſs, ſo obſtructed the paſſage, that neither the baggage nor artillery could proceed, nor could the troops defile in order. The opportunity was not neglected by the victorious horſe; they preſſed upon them ſo vigorouſly, that the French king's own regiment of foot called for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours. The purſuit was continued with great ſucceſs about five miles from the field of battle.

Few battles recorded in hiſtory were more complete than this of Ramillies: the greater part of the enemy's cannon and baggage fell into the hands of the allies, with above an hundred and twenty colours, and ſeveral pair of kettle-drums. The French loſt about forty thouſand men, near one half of their army; while the loſs of the allies was not more than two thouſand. Louvain, Mechlin, Bruſſels, Antwerp, Ghent, and Bruges, all opened their gates to the victors. Oſtend, Menin, Dendermonde, and Aeth, ſurrendered after a ſhort reſiſtance.

Nor was this the only misfortune attended the arms of France during this famous campaign. Turin was beſieged by the duke de Feuillade, who, like Villeroy, was more capable of making a figure at court, than at the head of an army. Chamillard, his father-in-law, had exhauſted the treaſury to ſupport this expedition; but the ſiege was ill-directed and of long continuance. The city was, however, at laſt reduced to extremity, and the duke of Savoy had joined prince Eugene, who commanded the army in Italy. They advanced to the relief of the city, diſperſed the French army commanded by the duke of Orleans, who commanded in the trenches, took all the proviſions, baggage, and military cheſt, made themſelves maſters of Peidmont, and ſoon after of the reſt of the Spaniſh territories in Italy. The faults of Feuillade, added to a ſecret order of the court, which forbade him to advance againſt the enemy, if they offered to relieve Turin, were the cauſes of this ruinous defeat.

The affairs of France were equally unſucceſsful in Spain. Philip, aſſiſted by the marſhal de Teſſe, laid ſiege to Barcelona early in the ſpring. The city was defended by Charles, his rival, in perſon. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour, and the place at laſt reduced to extremity. The earl of Peterborough advanced to its relief at the head of two thouſand men; but finding it impoſſible to enter the city, he took poſt on a neighbouring hill, and harraſſed the beſiegers with perpetual ſkirmiſhes. The ſiege was, however, preſſed with ſuch vigour, that it was thought impoſſible for the beſieged to hold out many days, when the news of the approach of the Engliſh fleet obliged the French admiral, who had blocked up the place by ſea, to retire. Philip, however, ſeemed determined to carry on his approaches, even after the combined fleets of England and Holland came to an anchor in the bay: but the next morning he raiſed the ſiege in a very diſorderly manner, leaving behind him all his tents, and great part of his military ſtores, together with his ſick and wounded. The marſhal de Teſſe recommended the latter to the care of the earl of Peterborough. He could not have applied to a more humane general. The ſick and wounded felt the lenient hand of compaſſion, and were uſed with the greateſt tenderneſs. In the mean time, lord Galway took ſeveral Spaniſh towns, and penetrated to the capital itſelf, which was abandoned at his approach; but Charles protracting his ſtay in Arragon, notwithſtanding repeated expreſſes, lord Galway was obliged to abandon Madrid, and retire before the Spaniſh army.

While great part of Europe was deſolated by the ſword of war, England and Scotland were engaged in treating of a union between the two kingdoms. The Scottiſh parliament met on the third of October, when the queen's letter was read, acquainting them, that the commiſſioners appointed to treat of an union between the two kingdoms had finiſhed the treaty, and hoped the articles would prove acceptable to her ſubjects of Scotland: that an entire and perfect union would be the ſolid foundation of a laſting peace; it would ſecure their religion, their liberties, and their properties; remove the animoſities that prevailed among themſelves, and the jealouſies that ſubſiſted between the two nations. She renewed her aſſurance of maintaining the government of the church; and told them they had now an opportunity of taking ſuch ſteps as might be thought neceſſary after the union: deſired the neceſſary ſupplies till the parliament of Great-Britain could provide for thoſe matters: and obſerved, that the great ſucceſs with which it had pleaſed God to bleſs her majeſty's arms, afforded a nearer proſpect of a happy peace, with which they would enjoy the full advantages of this union: and concluded with recommending calmneſs and unanimity in debating on this great and weighty affair, of ſuch important conſequence to the whole iſland of Great-Britain.

But though the union was ſo uſeful in the ſyſtem of government, and ſo neceſſary to the well-being of the ſtate, it met with the moſt violent oppoſition in the Scottiſh parliament. All parties ſeemed at firſt united to oppoſe it. The preſbyterians imagined their religion would be loſt; and the Jacobites were enraged to ſee the pretender for ever excluded from the crown. The nobility were ſhocked at the loſs of their beſt privileges, by the total abolition of their parliament. The merchants trembled for their commerce, notwithſtanding the advantageous liberty of trading to the Engliſh colonies. The nation in general conſidered itſelf as robbed of its rights, given up to ſlavery, and ſold to a foreign power. The duke of Hamilton, who headed the party that oppoſed the union, made a moſt vehement ſpeech againſt the treaty. "What!" cried he, "ſhall we abandon in the ſpace of one half hour, what our anceſtors have maintained for ſo many ages at the expence of their lives and fortunes? Are there here no deſcendants of thoſe brave patriots, who defended the liberty of their country againſt every aſſault? Where are the barons, where are the peers, who once joined their breaſts as a bulwark to the nation? Shall we ſacrifice the ſovereignty, the independency of our country, when our conſtituents call upon us to defend them, when they promiſe us ſupport?" Others obſerved, that to conſent to the treaty would be to overturn the conſtitution of the kingdom; that every people had their fundamental laws, which no authority could invade; that the exiſtence of the rights of parliament forming an eſſential part of the ſtate, the parliament itſelf had no right to diſpenſe with them: that the whole body of individuals ought to concur in the ſacrifice of their privileges; and that a ſacrifice of that kind was moſt palpably pernicious.

The clamour without doors was ſtill greater than within; the preſbyterian preachers employed all their power and credit to rouze the reſentment of their hearers againſt the treaty; nor did they labour in vain. The populace, tranſported with fury, erected the ſtandard of rebellion, burnt the articles of the union publickly, publiſhed a manifeſto, and declared they intended to diſſolve the parliament. Even in the capital itſelf the people grew mutinous, and aſſaulted the houſe of Sir Patrick Johnſon, provoſt of Edinburgh, and one of the commiſſioners of the union; nor did the perſon of the high-commiſſioner eſcape inſult, the rabble throwing ſtones into his coach as he paſſed through the ſtreets though ſurrounded by his guards. Theſe tumults alarmed the miniſtry, and it was thought neceſſary to march ſeveral regiments of horſe and dragoons into the north of England, that they might be in readineſs ſhould the enraged multitude break out into open rebellion. At laſt, however, affairs took a more favourable turn; whether the influence of the court or the means of corruption prevailed over the national ſpirit; whether the advantages of the union appeared in the end to over-balance its inconveniences, and the firſt alarms ſubſiding, reaſon and argument took place; or whether all theſe operated in concert; the Scottiſh parliament ratified all the articles with ſome ſlight alterations. Thus was a project that had been long wiſhed by all the thinking parts of the inhabitants of both kingdoms, and which had been ſeveral times attempted in vain, fully completed. Real utility will, ſooner or later, prevail, and every thing reſts in the power of government, if that power be ſteadily exerted with wiſdom.

The Engliſh parliament met on the third of December, when the queen in her ſpeech to both houſes, congratulated them on the glorious ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms; deſired the commons would grant ſuch ſupplies as would enable her to improve thoſe ſucceſſes; and concluded with recommending diſpatch in public affairs, as the ſureſt method of convincing our friends and enemies of the vigour and firmneſs of our proceedings.

This ſpeech was very pleaſing to the parliament, and affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes. The commons, after examining the eſtimates, voted near ſix millions for the enſuing year; and when the ſpeaker preſented the money bills to her majeſty, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was gained before it could be ſuppoſed the armies were in the field, ſo the commons had granted ſupplies to her majeſty before the enemy could well know that the parliament were ſitting. The parliament alſo voted their thanks to the duke of Marlborough for the eminent ſervices he had done his country during the laſt campaign, and then adjourned to the twenty-eighth of January.

A. D. 1708. On the day the parliament met after their adjournment, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and, in a ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, that the treaty of union, with ſome ſmall alterations and additions, was ratified by the Scottiſh parliament; that ſhe had ordered it to be laid before them, and hoped it would meet with their approbation and concurrence; deſired the commons would provide for the payment of the equivalent in caſe the treaty was ratified; and addreſſing herſelf to both houſes, concluded in the following manner:

"You have now an opportunity before you of putting the laſt hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a laſting bleſſing to the whole iſland, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm ſecurity to the proteſtant religion.

"The advantages that will accrue to us all from an union are ſo apparent, that I will add no more, but that I ſhall look upon it as a particular happineſs, if this great work, which has been ſo often attempted without ſucceſs, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

On the third of February, the commons formed themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe on the treaty of union; when it was oppoſed, with the utmoſt violence by the tory party. Sir John Packington obſerved, that the union might be compared to a forced marriage, where the woman does not conſent. "An act like this," ſaid he, "produced by corruption within doors, and by violence without, can never be permanent. The queen obliged by her coronation oath to maintain the church of England, hath now farther engaged herſelf to ſupport the preſbyterian kirk of Scotland. How can two objects ſo incompatible be conciliated in the ſame kingdom? How can two nations differing in a matter ſo eſſential be united." He concluded with obſerving, that the church of England being eſtabliſhed "jure divino," and the Scots pretending that the kirk was alſo "jure divino," he deſired the convocation might be conſulted on this critical circumſtance.

Colonel Mordaunt anſwered Sir John Packington. He began with obſerving, that for his part he knew of no other "jure divino" than God's permiſſion, and in this ſenſe the church of England and the kirk of Scotland might both be ſaid to be "jure divino," becauſe God had permitted the former to prevail in England, and the latter in Scotland. "The member who ſpoke laſt," continued the colonel, "may, if he pleaſes, conſult the convocation, for his own particular information; but I believe the commons ſtand in no need of ſuch inſtruction: they are ſufficient judges of the propriety of their own meaſures; and in any event it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England to aſk, on this occaſion, the advice of any inferior aſſembly, who had no ſhare in the legiſlature."

The debate was continued for a conſiderable time with great ſpirit; till the tory members, finding there was a very conſiderable majority againſt them, quitted the houſe. All oppoſition was now at an end: the commons examined the treaty article by article; and on the eleventh of February approved of the whole.

The lords took the treaty into conſideration on the fifteenth of February, and the debates were more ſolemn, and carried on with more deliberation than they had been in the lower houſe. Lord Haverſham obſerved, that the articles came to their lordſhips with the greateſt countenance of authority that it was poſſible for any thing to receive; but authority, though the ſtrongeſt motive to reſtrain the will, was certainly the weakeſt in the world to convince the underſtanding. He was not, he ſaid, againſt a fœderal union, a union in intereſt and in the ſucceſſion; but this was a matter of a different nature: the queſtion was, whether two nations, independent in their ſovereignties, with diſtinct laws and intereſt, and, which is not to be forgotten, of different forms of worſhip, church-government, and order, ſhall be united into one kingdom? That, in his opinion, this was an union compoſed of ſo many diſſimilar pieces, of ſuch jarring, incongruous ingredients, that he feared it would require a ſtanding force to keep the whole from falling aſunder, and breaking to pieces every moment. He farther obſerved, that by this act, an hundred Scots peers, and as many commanders, were excluded the Britiſh parliament; gentlemen who as little thought of being excluded a year or two before as any of their lordſhips did then; that their rights were as well and as ſtrongly ſecured to them as their lordſhips were at that time, by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by the claim of right, and by act of parliament, whereby it was made high-treaſon to make any alteration in the conſtitution of the kingdom. He ſaid that the union was contrary to the ſenſe of the Scottiſh nation, as was ſufficiently evident from the murmurs of all ranks of people while the treaty was under conſideration by that parliament. But the argument on which he laid the greateſt ſtreſs, was the injury the good old Engliſh conſtitution, juſtly allowed to be the moſt equal and beſt poiſed government in the world, might ſuffer by having the weight of ſixty-one Scottiſh members, and thoſe too returned by a Scottiſh privy-council, thrown into the ſcale.

It was eaſy to refute theſe arguments. Great affairs wear many different aſpects. The advantages and diſadvantages appear in contraſt; when the former preponderate, they ought to determine the debate. "The ſecurity and tranquillity of the kingdom," ſaid one of the advocates for the union, "will evidently be the fruits of this treaty. Our inveterate enemies, France and Popery, will be no longer formidable, when Great-Britain is united into one body. With reſpect to eccleſiaſtical affairs, a wiſe and moderate government may put an end to diſputes. Are not the Swiſs cantons united, though of different religions? And is not the German diet a proof that diverſity of creeds is no obſtacle to political union?" A treaty ſupported by reaſon, and oppoſed only by weak objections, naturally carried the majority of votes. The parliament approved the union; and experience ſoon made thoſe phantoms vaniſh, which imagination had raiſed againſt the good of the public. A bill of ratification was now brought in, and having paſſed both houſes, received the royal aſſent on the fourth of March, when the queen made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with the greateſt ſatisfaction I have given my aſſent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I conſider their union as a matter of great importance to the wealth, ſtrength, and ſafety of the whole iſland; and, at the ſame time, a work of ſo much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that, till now, all attempts that have been made towards it, in the courſe of above one hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt but it will be remembered and ſpoke of hereafter to the honour of thoſe who have been inſtrumental in bringing it to ſuch a happy concluſion. I deſire and expect from all my ſubjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all poſſible reſpect and kindneſs one to another, that ſo it may appear to all the world they have hearts diſpoſed to be one people.

"This will be a great pleaſure to me, and will make us all quickly ſenſible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a particular happineſs, that in my reign ſo full a proviſion is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the ſecurity of our religion, by ſo firm an eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant ſucceſſion throughout Great-Britain.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I take this occaſion to remind you of making effectual proviſion for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland within the time appointed by the act; and am perſuaded you will ſhew as much readineſs in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſeaſon of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the ſame zeal, which has appeared throughout this ſeſſion, in diſpatching what yet remains of the public buſineſs before you."

Thus this great deſign, ſo long wiſhed and laboured for in vain, was brought to a happy concluſion, and a final period put to thoſe fatal quarrels that had ſo often deſolated great part of both kingdoms. The miſcarriage of their ſettlement at Darien had convinced the merchants of Scotland, that every attempt of a ſimilar kind muſt be rendered abortive, while they were oppoſed by their more powerful neighbour; and this conſideration rendered them very deſirous of an union with England, eſpecially as their ſiſter kingdom offered to reimburſe them the expences that had attended their making that ſettlement. The thinking part of the nation had long obſerved, that Scotland was entirely at the mercy of the miniſtry, and that every new ſet of miniſters made uſe of that power to enrich themſelves and their creatures at the expence of the public; that the judges being made by them, were ſo dependent on their will, that in Scotland, where no juries were impannelled in civil cauſes, the whole property of the kingdom was in their hands, and at their diſpoſal. Experience had alſo convinced them, that it was of no conſequence to complain to the Engliſh council. The indigent noblemen and more indigent burghers formed a very conſiderable majority in the Scottiſh parliament, and were eaſily brought over to the intereſt of the court by promiſes and rewards. The only method, therefore, of removing theſe diſorders, was that of an incorporating union with England. The court was engaged to ſupport the union, in order to avert the dreadful blow with which they were threatened for paſſing the act of ſecurity in the year 1704. The lord treaſurer, to whom the paſſing that act was chiefly imputed, had been threatened with an impeachment. He therefore exerted all his intereſt with the utmoſt alacrity and zeal, to complete a treaty, on which his own power, as well as the happineſs of both kingdoms, in a great meaſure, depended. The court of France was reduced to ſo much diſtreſs, that it was impoſſible for them to give the Scots any aſſiſtance, either in men or money. Theſe various incidents acting in concert, brought this great work to a happy concluſion; and hence the reaſon is ſufficiently evident why the many attempts made at different times, and in different reigns, proved abortive: nothing but ſo remarkable a conjunction of incidents could now have rendered the deſign effectual.

The king of France, though long unfortunate, determined to make another attempt to recover his affairs, and, if poſſible, procure an honourable peace. He ſent freſh troops into Spain, however neceſſary they might be in Flanders, where the victorious Marlborough triumphed over every oppoſition. The duke of Berwick, natural ſon to James II. commanded the army of Philip, and advanced to Almanza; while the allies, under the command of lord Galway, marched to meet the enemy. On the fourteenth of April, the two armies were in ſight of each other, and a general engagement was now unavoidable. This was the moſt fatal battle the allies ſuffered during the whole war; and the following account of it was publiſhed by authority.

“ Our army entered the plain of Almanza about noon, formed into a line of battle, and marched in that poſition till they came within a mile of the enemy. Lord Galway, to ſupply our want of cavalry, had interlined a brigade of foot with each wing of horſe: but the enemy having drawn from the left ſome ſquadrons to reinforce the right wing, lord Tyrawley, who commanded on the left wing, ordered the Portugueſe horſe of the left of the rear-line, commanded by the count of Attalaya, to double into our firſt line, in order to make an equal front with the enemy.

“ About three in the afternoon the earl of Galway poſted himſelf at the head of the Engliſh dragoons, and advanced to begin the battle with the enemy's right wing of horſe; the Portugueſe being ordered to take the charge as it ſhould come to them from the left, but not before the Engliſh and Dutch were actually engaged. While we were advancing, the enemy began to play upon us from a battery on a riſing ground, nearly in the front of their right; but our troops preſſing on to come to a cloſe engagement, the cannon on either ſide did very little execution; and a detachment of dragoons being ſent, under colonel Dormer, to attack the enemy's battery, they retired, with their artillery, with great precipitation. As ſoon as our left wing was advanced within an hundred paces of the enemy's horſe, they alſo advanced out of their line to meet our charge, and the engagement ſoon became very bloody and obſtinate on both ſides. The enemy, by the weight of their ſquadrons, forced our's to retreat ſome paces; but two regiments of foot, on the left of that brigade which was interlined with the horſe in the firſt line, coming up, threw in their fire upon the enemy's flank and rear; and our cavalry, at the ſame time, renewing their charge in front, they were drove, in diſorder, through their own lines, with great ſlaughter.

“ By this time the Engliſh and Dutch foot, who formed the center of our army, under the command of lieutenant-general Erle and baron Freyſheim, were ſharply engaged, and broke through the enemy's firſt and ſecond lines, bearing down all before them as far as the walls of Almanza: but this ſucceſs was not of long duration; for the enemy's ſquadrons of the ſecond line fell upon their flank, and forced our infantry back with great loſs.

“ The enemy obſerving that the cavalry of our right did not advance with our left wing, detached ſome ſquadrons to fall upon the Portugueſe, who formed the right wing, under the command of the marquis das Minas. Theſe troops, in the moſt daſtardly manner, gave way upon the firſt charge; the whole horſe of the right wing fled, and abandoned their infantry, who were moſt of them either killed or taken priſoners. The battle ſtill continued on our left wing, the enemy ſtill charging us with freſh ſquadrons, but without ſucceſs; which the duke of Berwick perceiving, he ſent nine battalions, moſt of them French, who drew up before the firſt line of Spaniſh horſe, to oppoſe our brigade of foot, conſiſting of five regiments. At the ſame time, he brought up ſeveral freſh ſquadrons, to make another charge upon our left wing of horſe. The count de Attalaya, who commanded the Portugueſe horſe that were mixed with our dragoons, was carried off wounded. Our troops were now attacked on every ſide; and being left naked in the flanks by the cowardly flight of the Portugueſe wing, were ſurrounded and hemmed in on all ſides.

“ In this dreadful ſituation, they formed themſelves into a hollow ſquare, and retired from the field of battle. Had they been able to make good their retreat, the enemy would have had no great cauſe to boaſt of the victory, the loſs on both ſides being nearly equal; but the men, after marching nine hours without any refreſhment, and fighting about ſix, were faint with fatigue: all their ammunition was ſpent; they ſaw themſelves abandoned by their own horſe, and in a country to which they were utter ſtrangers; deſtitute of proviſions, and cut off from all hopes of a ſupply. Theſe conſiderations induced them to ſurrender themſelves, amounting to thirteen battalions, priſoners of war. They accordingly diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke of Berwick, deſiring honourable terms, which were very readily granted. The duke, who believed this body beyond his reach, immediately diſpatched the count d'Aſfeldt to receive their ſurrender, on theſe conditions: that they ſhould be priſoners of war till exchanged; that they ſhould be all diſarmed, except the officers, who were to keep their ſwords; and that they ſhould have liberty to ſend for their baggage before they marched any farther. The Portugueſe, and part of the Engliſh horſe that guarded the baggage, retreated to Alcira.”

In this fatal action, the allies loſt above ten thouſand men, two thouſand of whom were left dead on the field of battle, and among thoſe ſeveral officers of diſtinction. Lord Galway himſelf was wounded in the face, and ſeveral others very dangerouſly. The loſs of the enemy on the field was nearly equal to that of the confederates. The provinces of Valentia and Arragon were reduced, and the campaign was cloſed with the taking of Lerida, which happened on the ſecond of November. Catalonia was now the only province in Spain that remained to Charles; all the reſt of his conqueſts having been loſt by the fatal battle of Almanza.

In the mean time, Villars became formidable in Germany; but France was ſtill in danger. The duke of Savoy and prince Eugene paſſed the Var, and beſieged Toulon. The combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, blocked up the place by ſea, and aſſiſted in the reduction of this important place. Had the enterprize ſucceeded, Provence would have been loſt, and the allies might have carried the conqueſt much farther into France. But the operations were not puſhed with that vigour that ſeems to command ſucceſs. The ſecret of the expedition had not been kept, and a powerful reinforcement arrived before the place could be taken. It was therefore determined to raiſe the ſiege, but not before they had left evident marks of their viſit. Orders were therefore iſſued for a general bombardment, both by ſea and land. This dreadful farewell greatly diſtreſſed the enemy: eight ſhips of the line were burnt in the harbour, twenty-three were ſunk at the entrance of the mole, few of which could ever be recovered; ſeveral magazines, and above ſixty houſes, were deſtroyed in the city; and the devaſtations committed in the adjacent country were eſtimated at near five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling.

But England ſuffered a ſtill greater misfortune. Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, in his return with the fleet to England, ran upon the rocks of Scilly, where his own ſhip, the Aſſociation, together with that of the Eagle, Firebrand, and Romney, were loſt, and all the crews periſhed.

The campaign in the Netherlands produced no actions of conſequence. Marlborough had made a journey to Leipſic, where he endeavoured to bring over Charles XII. of Sweden to the intereſt of the allies. His negotiation was fruitleſs; and when he returned, and put himſelf at the head of the allied army, the French refuſed to fight; nor was it in his power to force them to an engagement.

The firſt parliament of Great-Britain met at Weſtminſter on the twenty-third of October, and the ſeſſion was opened by her majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne. She told them, that ſhe did not doubt but they came with hearts prepared to make the union ſo proſperous, that it might anſwer the moſt ſanguine expectations of her ſubjects, and the reaſonable apprehenſions of her enemies: that nothing was ſo material as to convince their foes by demonſtrating, that the uniting their intereſts had not only improved their abilities, but alſo their reſolutions to proſecute the war with vigour, till an honourable peace could be obtained.

She obſerved, that though the attempt upon Toulon had not been attended with the deſired ſucceſs, it had not been wholly without effect. She mentioned the loſs we had ſuſtained in Spain, and the operations of the war in Italy; and requeſted the ſupplies neceſſary for proſecuting the war during the approaching campaign. Then directing her diſcourſe to the late union, ſhe ſaid, "It is impoſſible but ſome doubts and difficulties muſt have ariſen on account of that meaſure, which, however, ſhe hoped, were ſo far overcome, as to have defeated the deſigns of thoſe who would have made uſe of that handle to foment diſturbances." After recommending ſeveral particulars rendered neceſſary to be provided for by the articles of union, ſhe concluded with aſſuring them, "that nothing ſhould be wanting on her part to procure her people all the bleſſings that could follow from that happy circumſtance of her reign, and to extinguiſh the leaſt occaſion of jealouſy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of her united kingdom could ſuffer by the conſequences of the union; and hoped they would ſuffer nothing to prevail with them to diſunite among themſelves, or abate their zeal in oppoſing the common enemy."

Both houſes preſented very affectionate addreſſes to her majeſty, and voted near ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They afterwards preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, againſt making any peace, as it could not be favourable to her and her allies, while Spain and the Weſt Indies, or any part of the Spaniſh monarchy remained in the hands of the houſe of Bourbon.

Lewis XIV. after trying every method to induce the allies to accept his offers for a general peace, reſolved to attempt an invaſion of Great Britain. He knew that the generality of the Scots were exaſperated by the union, and flattered himſelf that they would readily join a French army to place the ſon of the late abdicated monarch on the Engliſh throne. He was not deceived with regard to the Scots. Highly averſe to an incorporating union with England, they could not, without the higheſt indignation, behold themſelves reduced to a ſtate of dependence upon the Engliſh; and thought no means ſo likely to ſhake off the yoke as that of bringing about a revolution in the government. Lewis accordingly received the moſt flattering promiſes of joining his army with thirty thouſand men completely armed, if he would land a ſmall army in their country.

Deſirous of embracing every method to diſtreſs the Engliſh, Lewis collected a fleet at Dunkirk, conſiſting of eight ſhips of the line, and ſeventy tranſports, on board of which ſix thouſand men were embarked for an invaſion of Scotland. The troops were commanded by the count de Gracé, and the fleet by the chevalier de Fourbin Janſon, one of the beſt ſea officers of his time. Could theſe troops have been landed in Scotland it might have been attended with very diſagreeable conſequences, there not being above three thouſand regular troops in that kingdom, while England was abſolutely defenceleſs, her forces being engaged on the continent.

A large fleet of ſhips under the command of Sir George Byng, was ſtationed off Dunkirk. Several regiments of foot, and ſome ſquadrons of cavalry arrived from Flanders, and marched immediately towards the borders of Scotland. The habeas corpus act was ſuſpended, and a proclamation was iſſued, declaring the pretender, his accomplices and adherents, rebels and traitors.

A ſtrong gale of wind having driven the Engliſh admiral from his ſtation into the Downs, the French admiral took the opportunity of ſailing from Dunkirk, directing his courſe towards Scotland. Sir George was ſoon informed of the eſcape of the enemy; and entered the Frith of Edinburgh only a few hours after the French. The ſudden appearance of the Engliſh ſo intimidated the enemy, that they immediately crouded all the ſail they could carry, and favoured at once by the darkneſs of the night and a freſh gale from the ſhore, and eſcaped. The Saliſbury, a ſhip the French had taken ſome time before, fell into the hands of the Engliſh. Several of the Scottiſh nobility were arreſted; and Lewis gained no other reputation than that of adding a raſh enterprize to his other misfortunes.

The only inconvenience that attended this attempt was a conſiderable run upon the bank, which it was feared would affect the credit of the nation. The commons immediately voted, "that whoever deſignedly endeavoured to deſtroy or leſſen the public credit, eſpecially at a time when the kingdom was in danger of an invaſion, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor, and an enemy to her majeſty and the nation." The lord treaſurer alſo ſignified to the bank, that her majeſty would allow for ſix months, an intereſt of ſix per cent. upon their bills. This advantageous propoſal induced ſeveral opulent noblemen and merchants to offer them very conſiderable ſums; and the directors having called in twenty per cent. on their capital ſtock, they were ſoon in a condition to anſwer all the demands made upon them by the timorous, the envious, or the diſaffected.

Lewis, equally chagrined by adverſity as elated with ſucceſs, made ſtrong efforts to triumph over fortune. Notwithſtanding his loſſes were immenſe he ſtill found reſources. An army of one hundred thouſand men, commanded by the duke of Burgundy, aſſiſted by the duke of Vendome, was to retrieve the honour of the French arms in the Low Countries. But theſe generals, unfortunately for Lewis, were of different diſpoſitions; the former pious, the latter licentious, and conſequently agreed but ill with each other. They, however, ſurprized Ghent and Bruges; advanced into Dutch Flanders, and laid the country under contribution.

Marlborough immediately wrote to prince Eugene, deſiring he would haſten his march and join him, being determined to give the enemy battle, though the allied army was inferior in number to the enemy, as the only method, in his opinion, to prevent their farther progreſs, which might otherwiſe end with cutting off the communication of the allies with Brabant. The prince had no ſooner joined the army than it was determined to paſs the Dender and offer the enemy battle. Confident of ſucceſs from their ſuperiority of numbers, the French inveſted Oudenarde, from a perſuaſion that they ſhould be able to take it before the prince could join Marlborough's army. They were deceived. The allies marched with ſurprizing expedition, and the French thought to raiſe the ſiege at their approach. The duke of Vendome was for drawing up the army in order of battle; but was oppoſed by the duke of Burgundy, who reſolved to continue his march. But an incident ſoon convinced him that it was now impoſſible to avoid an engagement. General Cadogan, at the head of ſixteen battalions and eight ſquadrons, fell upon ſeven battalions of foot poſted in the village of Heynem, a little below Oudenarde upon the Schelde. The attack was made with ſo much ſucceſs, that the enemy was ſoon driven out of the village, and being purſued with a cloſe fire, a whole brigade threw down their arms, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The duke of Burgundy now endeavoured to diſengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles through which they were marching, in order to draw them up in the plain; but the confederate generals were too experienced to give him time to effect his purpoſe: their army was already formed in order of battle, and advanced to the charge with great alacrity. The enemy faced about and formed, but with great diſorder, which was increaſed by the miſunderſtanding that prevailed between their two generals, the duke of Burgundy continually countermanding what the duke of Vendome had ordered.

About four in the afternoon the battle began, and continued with great firmneſs till ten at night. The confederates had the advantage in every attack, and drove the enemy from one poſt to another, till night put an end to the combat. The foot were principally engaged in this action, the broken ground rendering it very difficult for the horſe to act. Marlborough perceived it, and detached the greater part of his cavalry from the right and left wing to a very conſiderable diſtance, where they fell upon the enemy both in flank and rear with ſuch impetuoſity, that the French were thrown into confuſion, part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynſe and Ghent, and another part to Courtray. The duke de Vendome, ſeeing the forces flying in every part, formed a rear-guard of about twenty-five ſquadrons, and the ſame number of battalions, with which he ſecured the retreat of his forces. This precaution proved the ſafety of the whole French army; for the next morning at day-break the duke of Marlborough detached a large body of horſe and foot, under the command of the lieutenant-generals Bulau and Lumley, to purſue the fugitives; but the prudence of the duke de Vendome prevented them from executing their deſign.

In this action, which was called the battle of Oudenarde, about four thouſand of the enemy were left dead on the field of battle, two thouſand deſerted, and about eight thouſand were taken priſoners, including a great number of officers. The allies alſo took ten pieces of cannon, about one hundred ſtandards, eight pair of kettle-drums, and four thouſand horſe. The loſs of the confederates did not exceed two thouſand men.

It was not at all ſurprizing that two ſuch great generals as Marlborough and Eugene, who always acted in concert, ſhould defeat an army more numerous than their own; but all Europe was aſtoniſhed when they ſaw them lay ſiege to Liſle, in ſight of a formidable army, which might at leaſt carry off their convoys, and by that means reduce them to the laſt extremity, if they did not attack them in their entrenchments. But notwithſtanding all theſe circumſtances, the place was inveſted on the thirtieth of Auguſt; prince Eugene commanding on one ſide, and the prince of Orange on the other, while Marlborough encamped at Helchin to cover the ſiege. Liſle was the ſtrongeſt town in Flanders, furniſhed with ammunition, and every neceſſary, and the garriſon had been lately reinforced with one and twenty battalions of the beſt troops in France, commanded by marſhal Boufflers.

The ſiege was puſhed with the utmoſt vigour, while every effort was made by the French to oblige the confederates to abandon the undertaking. The dukes of Burgundy and Vendome marched towards the duke of Marlborough, and for ſome days cannonaded his camp: but finding all their endeavours to bring him to an engagement fruitleſs, and not daring to attack him in his ſtrong camp, they retired, and determined for the future to employ their troops in cutting off the convoys coming with proviſions and ammunition for the beſiegers; and in covering thoſe provinces which were expoſed to the incurſions of the allies.

Marlborough had detached ſix thouſand men to cover the march of ſeven hundred waggons coming from Oſtend with ſupplies to prince Eugene's camp. The duke of Burgundy had information of this convoy, and ſent an army of twenty-two thouſand men to intercept it. But the ſmall detachment that guarded the waggons, made ſo noble a defence, under the command of major-general Webb, that they obliged the enemy to retire with the loſs of ſeven thouſand men killed on the ſpot. This action is generally called the battle of Wynenendale, and was one of the moſt glorious atchievements performed during the whole courſe of the war. It was alſo of the utmoſt importance to the allies; for had the convoy been taken, they muſt have raiſed the ſiege.

The ſiege was now carried on with ſuch vigour and ſucceſs, that on the twenty-ſecond of October the town was ſurrendered, and the garriſon retired into the citadel, where they made a gallant defence till the eighth of December, when the marſhal delivered up the place, the garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, and were eſcorted to Douay. At the ſame time the duke of Savoy was maſter of the paſſes leading to Dauphiny. The emperor Joſeph, brother to the archduke Charles, was in poſſeſſion of Landau, one of the keys of France. Paris trembled, and the whole kingdom was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion.

Philip V. whoſe deſtiny fluctuated on the tide of events, could not be much happier than Lewis XIV. The emperor had already taken from him Naples and Lombardy. The Engliſh had taken Sardinia for the emperor, and the iſland of Minorca for themſelves. Pope Clement XI. in alliance with the family of Bourbon, took up arms againſt Joſeph; but was ſoon obliged to lay them down, and acknowledge the archduke Charles, king of Spain. The duke of Orleans, who commanded the army in Spain, had indeed ſome ſucceſs; but his misfortunes were greater than his acquiſitions; and the fidelity of the Catalonians had many heavy ſhocks to maintain.

While victory attended the allies in every quarter, the queen had the misfortune to loſe her huſband, the prince of Denmark. He died about ten in the morning on the twenty-eighth of October, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. He was a prince of a very amiable character, without ambition or intrigue, and therefore incapable of giving offence to either party. He always contented himſelf with being the firſt ſubject, ſeldom interfering in buſineſs, though his office of lord high-admiral gave him a claim to a very conſiderable ſhare. Her majeſty, who had been the moſt tender and affectionate wife, was inconſoleable for his loſs.

A ſingular event that happened about this time engaged the attention of the nation. Count Mattheoff, the Ruſſian ambaſſador, was arreſted in the ſtreet at the ſuit of one Morton, a laceman, and inſolently treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a ſpunging-houſe; nor could he obtain his liberty till he was bailed by the earl of Feverſham and a merchant in the city. This inſult on the perſon of an ambaſſador was loudly complained of as an attrocious breach of the law of nations. Enraged at the inſult, the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, and thoſe of ſeveral other powers, demanded redreſs. The Czar himſelf declared he would be ſatisfied with nothing leſs than the death of the offenders. The queen, who reſented the injury as much as the Czar, was very deſirous of making him ſatisfaction: but the laws of England admitted of no ſuch puniſhment. She obſerved to the Czar that juſtice in this country is diſpenſed by the laws only; and no exception was found for a caſe of this nature. The judges of the queen's-bench granted informations againſt the laceman and thirteen others. They were found guilty, and the privileges of ambaſſadors again acknowledged; and the parliament paſſed a bill for ſecuring the privileges of foreign miniſters. The queen conſented to make apologies by her miniſters to the Ruſſian court; and the Czar was ſatisfied. He could not help admiring, notwithſtanding his deſpotiſm, that mild legiſlation which is ſo attentive to guard the meaneſt ſubject from the attacks of arbitrary power.

On the ſecond of November the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, when the lord chancellor informed the houſe, "that the commiſſioners were appointed by her majeſty to acquaint them, that ſhe expected they would continue to proſecute the war with the ſame vigour and reſolution, with which it had hitherto been conducted: that ſhe hoped they would enable her to make ſuch augmentation of her forces as they ſhould judge neceſſary for preſerving and improving the advantages which the allies had gained in the Netherlands: that ſhe deſired they would prepare ſuch bills as might confirm and perfect the union: that if they would propoſe means for the advancement of trade and manufactures, ſhe would take pleaſure in enacting ſuch proviſions: and that as ſhe had the moſt ſincere regard for the preſervation of their liberties and the ſupport of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ſhe would continue to exert her utmoſt endeavours to defeat the deſigns of the pretender and all his abettors.

Addreſſes of condolance on the death of her conſort, and of congratulation on the ſucceſs of her arms, were preſented by both houſes; and the commons voted above ſeven millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year; this it was imagined would be ſufficient to augment the army with ten thouſand men, and procure new advantages over the armies of the grand diſturber of Europe.

Several important affairs came under the conſideration of parliament during this ſeſſion, but the principal was the naturalization of foreign proteſtants. This propoſition was debated with great ſpirit in both houſes, and many forcible arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion. The whigs ſupported the bill; the tories oppoſed it. The former affirmed, that it would prove an effectual means of encouraging induſtry, improving trade and manufactures, and repairing the loſs of men which the war had occaſioned. They inſtanced the conduct of the king of Pruſſia, who, by inviting the French to ſettle in his dominions, had fertilized a barren and ill-peopled country, improved its trade and manufactures, augmented its revenues, and procured many other very conſiderable advantages. But the chief motive of the whigs for puſhing this bill, was to throw an additional weight of foreigners into the balance againſt the landed intereſt. The oppoſers of this act of naturalization objected, that ſuch a ſwarm of aliens might bring with them many dangerous conſequences to the conſtitution; that it was, in fact, inviting ſo many ſpies and informers among us, ſince it could not be ſuppoſed they would leave all affection for their mother-country behind them, tho' they might gladly embrace, for the preſent, the aſylum offered them in this kingdom. It was ſaid, they would find means to inſinuate themſelves into many places of truſt and profit, and even to ſeats in the great aſſembly of national repreſentatives; and, by frequent intermarriages, contribute to the extinction of the Engliſh race. It was added, that they would greatly increaſe the number of our poor, already ſo great a burden to this country; and take out of the mouths of Engliſh tradeſmen and labourers great part of the bread they now earned by their induſtry. Theſe arguments, however powerful, were not ſufficient to prevent the bill from paſſing both houſes, and afterwards receiving the royal aſſent.

A. D. 1709. A motion being made in the houſe of commons for leaving out the prayer for the queen's having iſſue, on preſumption that her majeſty would continue a widow during the remainder of her life; Mr. Watſon, ſon to lord Rockingham, moved to addreſs the queen, "That ſhe would not ſuffer her juſt grief to prevail ſo far; but that ſhe would, in compliance with the earneſt wiſhes of her people, entertain thoughts of a ſecond marriage." This motion was carried, and preſented to the queen, who returned for anſwer, "That the proviſion ſhe had made for the proteſtant ſucceſſion would always be a proof of her hearty concern for the happineſs of the nation; but that the ſubject of their addreſs was of ſuch a nature, that ſhe was perſuaded they did not expect a particular anſwer."

A very ſevere winter had greatly increaſed the miſeries of France. The olive trees in the ſouthern provinces were deſtroyed, and the greater part of the fruit-trees killed by the froſt. There were no hopes of a harveſt, and very little corn in the granaries. The numerous armies of Lewis ſeemed to be periſhing for want, and that haughty monarch was reduced to the neceſſity of imploring a peace. He offered to demoliſh Straſburg and Dunkirk, to abandon the pretender, to renounce all pretenſions to the Spaniſh monarchy, to grant the ſtates-general the barrier they demanded in the Low Countries, and to treat with the emperor, agreeable to the treaty of Ryſwick. The more this proud monarch was humbled by diſtreſs, the more his misfortunes were inſulted. Prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and the grand penſioner Henſius, united in the ſame political views, were wiſely for reducing him to the laſt extremities. They were deſirous of preventing him from troubling the repoſe of Europe for the future. Accordingly they demanded, that as he gave up the crown of Spain, he ſhould take proper meaſures to ſee it vacated, and even employ his troops for that purpoſe. This was a propoſal nothing but the utmoſt diſtreſs could reduce the French monarch to accept. He abſolutely refuſed it, and determined to carry on the war for ſome time longer, rather than ſubmit to ſuch unworthy conditions. "If I muſt uſe arms, (ſaid he) I ſhould rather chuſe to uſe them againſt mine enemies, than againſt my own children."

Lewis, on this occaſion, had recourſe to a very extraordinary meaſure. He laid the unreaſonable demands of the allies before his people, in a circular letter; and after acquainting them with the additional burdens he was obliged to lay upon them, he endeavoured to excite their indignation, to rouſe their honour, and even excite their pity. This produced the deſired effect: the people reſolved to expend their whole ſubſtance in defence of the honour of their king, and even to fight his battles without pay, rather than abandon him to the infamy of accepting ſuch humiliating terms. The manufacturers and labourers, who wanted bread, turned ſoldiers. Villars was appointed commander in chief; Boufflers, tho' his ſenior, conſenting to ſerve under him. This patriotic conceſſion acquired him more honour than if he had been intruſted with the principal command.

On the twenty-ſecond of June, the allied army aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Liſle, amounting to one hundred and ten thouſand men; and it was determined by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough to open the campaign immediately. Villars had taken poſſeſſion of a very advantageous camp in the plain of Lans, where he threw up intrenchments, in order to act on the defenſive. The allies, not chuſing to attack the enemy in their intrenchments, opened the campaign with the ſiege of Tournay. The town itſelf made no great reſiſtance; but the citadel was ſo ſtrong, both by art and nature, and ſo gallantly defended by lieutenant-general Surville, at the head of four thouſand men, that it held out a month againſt all the efforts of the allies, and was at laſt ſurrendered by an honourable capitulation.

Mons was now threatened by the victorious confederates; and Villars, in order to cover the place, poſted himſelf behind the woods of la Merte and Trainiere, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The French amounted to one hundred and twenty thouſand men; and the allies, who were now joined by the Heſſians, to near the ſame number. On the ninth of September, the two armies were ſo near one another, that a cannonade began between them; and the allies perceiving that it would be impoſſible to inveſt Mons while the French army continued in its preſent ſituation, it was determined to attack the enemy in their intrenchments. Purſuant to this reſolution, batteries were erected on the wings and in the center of the allied army, and every thing prepared for making the attempt.

General Schuylemburgh and the duke of Argyle began the attack about eight in the morning, at the head of eighty-ſix battalions, ſupported by two-and-twenty ſquadrons, commanded by count Lottum. The attack and reſiſtance were equally obſtinate; but the aſſailants at laſt prevailed, and the left wing of the French were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The right of the enemy, poſted in the wood of la Merte, and ſecured by triple entrenchments, was next attacked by the prince of Orange and baron Fagel, at the head of thirty-ſix battalions of Dutch troops. The battle was here ſupported with the moſt deſperate courage on both ſides. The French were obliged to quit the firſt entrenchment, but were repulſed, with great ſlaughter from the ſecond. But marſhal Villars, having received a wound in his knee at the attack, was obliged to be carried from the field of battle. The loſs of their commander greatly depreſſed the courage of the French, and their reſiſtance, from that moment, became leſs vigorous. The prince of Orange having rallied his forces returned to the charge, and ſoon drove the enemy from their intrenchments, and out of the wood into the plain, where their horſe were all drawn up in proper order. The battle now became general, and the victory was diſputed with great vigour till three in the afternoon, when the French began to give way, and were purſued, with great ſlaughter, to the defile of Bavay.

This was the deareſt victory the allies purchaſed during the whole war; near eighteen thouſand of their troops being ſlain on the field of battle, and among them ſeveral officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the enemy did not amount to more than eight or nine thouſand; but the diſgrace of a total defeat, and even of being driven from their intrenched camp, ſtruck ſuch a panic into the French ſoldiers, that their generals did not think it prudent to make any farther attempt to ſave Mons, which ſurrendered about the middle of November, when both armies retired into winter quarters.

The parliament met on the fifteenth of November; and the queen opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe told both houſes, "That the enemy had, in the beginning of the year, endeavoured, by falſe appearances, and deceitful inſinuations of a deſire after peace, to create jealouſies and diviſions among the allies; but that they had been diſappointed in their expectations, ſuch meaſures having been taken as rendered it impoſſible for them to diſguiſe their inſincerity: that God had been pleaſed to bleſs the arms of the confederates with a moſt remarkable victory, and other ſucceſſes, which had laid France open to the impreſſion of the allied arms, and conſequently rendered peace more neceſſary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign: that ſhe hoped they would enable her to proſecute the advantages ſhe had gained, by reducing within proper limits that exorbitant and oppreſſive power, which had ſo long threatened the liberties of Chriſtendom."

This ſpeech was very agreeable to the parliament: they preſented addreſſes of thanks to the queen for her ſpeech from the throne, congratulated her on the ſucceſs of her arms, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his ſignal ſervices. The commons were ſo eager for proſecuting the war with vigour, that they voted above ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year. Theſe immenſe ſums granted by parliament ſtruck the court of France with terror, as they ſufficiently demonſtrated that the credit of England was in its full vigour, while their own was reduced to the loweſt ebb. At the ſame time, it was evident that the Engliſh parliament was determined to carry on the war till the haughty Lewis was ſufficiently humbled.

But while we were triumphing over Lewis, and France was mourning over her miſfortunes, a very ſingular trial re-kindled the animoſity of parties. Dr. Sacheverel, an enthuſiaſtic preacher, a man of little knowledge and great prejudice, carried away by the ſpirit of party, which is too often, though very unjuſtly, called zeal, exerted his talents ſtrongly in favour of paſſive obedience, and againſt the toleration of the non-conformiſts; inſiſting that the church was in danger, and that there was a neceſſity for taking proper meaſures for her defence. This was boldly attacking the principles of the whigs, the chief authors of the revolution; and gave occaſion to the moſt violent debates. The houſe of commons voted Sacheverel's ſermons to be ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, and impeached him before the houſe of lords of high crimes and miſdemeanors.

A. D. 1710. The trial came on before the peers on the twenty-ſeventh of February. This trial continued near three weeks, during which time all buſineſs was ſuſpended, and the capital thrown into the utmoſt ferment. The doctor was attended to and from Weſtminſter, during the time of his trial, by multitudes of people, crying out, "God bleſs the church and Sacheverel." They even proceeded to ſuch lengths, that they demoliſhed ſeveral meeting-houſes, and made bonfires in the ſtreets with the materials, with loud huzzas of "High-church and Sacheverel."

The debates in the houſe of lords became ſo intereſting, that the queen herſelf was preſent. The earl of Wharton obſerved, that Sacheverel's doctrine of paſſive obedience might have the moſt ſerious and dangerous conſequences; that the principle of reſiſtance was the corner-ſtone of the revolution; that to ſuppoſe it unlawful, was to ſuppoſe a great part of the people, and the parliament itſelf, guilty of rebellion and injuſtice; that, of conſequence, the preſent government could not be conſidered as lawful, becauſe the queen's right was wholly derived from the revolution. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, the famous partizan of William, juſtified reſiſtance from hiſtory, both ancient and modern. He alledged the examples of the Maccabees, the Dutch, the conduct of Elizabeth in their behalf, and the ſuccours granted to the Hugonots; adding, that though the contrary opinion had prevailed, thoſe who affected to ſupport it were the firſt to plead for reſiſtance when they ſaw themſelves oppreſſed. The biſhop of Bath and Wells, who was more a tory in his principles than Burnet, agreed that reſiſtance might be lawful in certain extraordinary caſes; but added, that the doctrine ought not to be propagated among the people, who would be ready, on many occaſions, to abuſe it; and that the revolution, which ſhould rather be called a "Vocation," ought not to be cited as an example; that the term, "original contract," if not uſed with great reſerve, might inſpire the moſt pernicious ſentiments; and that obedience could not be preached with too much zeal, when reſiſtance was ſupported by indiſcreet apologies. Theſe reflections irritated the duke of Argyle: he aſſerted, "that the clergy had, in all ages, abandoned the intereſts of the people, and extolled the majeſty of kings, that they might govern them with greater eaſe; and that this was a ſufficient reaſon why they ſhould not interfere in political matters." Several of the moſt diſtinguiſhed tories owned, that the doctor's ſermons were extravagant and abſurd; but inſiſted that they were not ſufficient to condemn him. He was, however, found guilty by a majority of ſeven votes; on which he was ſuſpended from the pulpit for three years, and his ſermons condemned to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, together with the famous decree of the univerſity of Oxford in favour of abſolute authority and the irrevocable right of kings.

This ſentence was thought ſo favourable by Sacheverel's party, that they conſidered it as a victory over the whigs. The queen herſelf ſeemed to favour a doctrine that tended to ſecure her throne, and to eſtabliſh the public tranquillity. She now prorogued the parliament, after expreſſing her concern both for the time that had been loſt on a private affair, and for the injurious ſuppoſition that the church was in danger under the government.

The laſt campaign having weakened ſtill more the reſources of France, Lewis XIV. once more ſued for peace. The allies enjoyed the humiliation of his ambition. The negotiations were opened at the little town of Gertruydenberg, where the French ambaſſadors met with a thouſand mortifications. It was in vain that Lewis made ſuch offers as would have been ſhameful if neceſſity had not the ſame power over ſovereigns as over common men. He even offered to furniſh money ſufficient to drive his grandſon from the throne of Spain, in caſe he refuſed to abandon it, in exchange for a ſmall dominion that ſhould be aſſigned him. It was abſolutely inſiſted upon, that Lewis himſelf ſhould dethrone him by force of arms. This the French monarch refuſed, and the ambaſſadors returned to their reſpective countries.

The operations of the field were not ſuſpended, even while the negotiations were carrying on. The forces of the allies were aſſembled, and the campaign was opened with the ſiege of Douay, which ſurrendered on the twenty-ninth of June, after a noble defence of two months. Marſhal Villars had poſted himſelf near Arras, and ſtrongly fortified his camp. Marlborough did every thing in his power to bring the French to a general engagement, but without ſucceſs: Villars acted with ſo much precaution, that he not only avoided a battle, but alſo prevented the allies from beſieging Mons. There was, indeed, the utmoſt neceſſity for his acting in this prudent manner. Mons was the key of Picardy; and had that place been taken, the whole province had been wholly at the mercy of the confederates. Diſappointed in their deſign againſt Mons, the allies inveſted Bethune, which, in about three weeks, ſurrendered. They alſo made themſelves maſters of St. Venant and Aire. The laſt ſurrendered on the tenth of November, when Marlborough put his troops into winter-quarters.

Philip V. was now reduced to the brink of ruin. Stanhope, the Engliſh general, was the firſt that gained an advantage over his troops. Stamberg, the German general, defeated them at Saragoſſa, and Charles entered Madrid in triumph. Still the zeal of the Caſtalians ſupported them under all their misfortunes. Lewis was no longer in a condition of ſupporting them. He, however, ſent the duke de Vendôme, a man adored by his ſoldiers, and who highly merited their love. He no ſooner arrived in Spain, than a multitude of volunteers flocked to his ſtandard; and notwithſtanding the public calamities, efforts were made to furniſh him with money and proviſions. He immediately beſieged Stanhope in Brihuega, and took him and his garriſon priſoners. He gained a deciſive battle againſt Stamberg, at Ville-Vicioſa; and in three or four months, reſtored the affairs of Philip, and put him in poſſeſſion of a kingdom of which he had hardly the title left. Had Vendôme never been called from the ſolitude to which he had retired, in all probability, the houſe of Bourbon would have totally loſt the kingdom of Spain. Of ſuch conſequence to the affairs of empire is a ſingle leader of genius and talents, when he is revered for his virtues!

Marlborough, though born to be an honour to his country, was a man, and therefore ſubject to failings. He was too fond of wealth and grandeur, and this gave a handle to his diſgrace. He daily loſt credit with the queen, becauſe he wanted to act the maſter rather than the ſubject. The caprice and intolerable haughtineſs of his dutcheſs occaſioned an incurable rupture. The queen had now another favourite, and the tories determined to employ her intereſt in bringing about a total change in the miniſtry. Mrs. Maſham, the name of the lady, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late ſecretary of ſtate, who directed her in the manner ſhe was to proceed with the queen, and ſuch ſprings it was neceſſary to put in motion, in order to effect the intended purpoſe. Mrs. Maſham was poſſeſſed of every requiſite to make her the agreeable companion and confederate. The dutcheſs of Marlborough grew intolerably jealous, and, by her natural impetuoſity, widened the wound ſhe ſhould have endeavoured to cloſe. She wrote a very inſolent letter to the queen, in which, among other haughty expreſſions, ſhe ſaid, "Do me juſtice, and give me no anſwer." She was, however, ſoon ſenſible of her fault, and was very deſirous of making reparation; but neither her repentance, her prayers, nor her tears, had power to move a wounded heart ſhe had ſo long held in ſlavery. "You deſired no anſwer," ſaid the queen, "and you ſhall have no anſwer."

In the mean time, Mrs. Maſham neglected neither art nor opportunity to fix herſelf firmly in the affections of her royal miſtreſs; and ſucceeded beyond her hopes. In one of their converſations, ſhe artfully gave the ſubject a political turn, in the courſe of which ſhe informed her of many things to which ſhe was before wholly a ſtranger; and when ſhe perceived her curioſity was ſufficiently awakened, ſhe referred her, for farther ſatisfaction, to Mr.

Harley, of whom the queen had entertained a very high opinion. He was accordingly admitted to ſeveral private conferences, and by him the queen was informed of the general diſcontent which prevailed in every part of the kingdom, at ſeeing its moſt eſſential intereſts ſacrificed to gratify the ambitious views of a private family. He aſſured her majeſty ſhe had nothing to fear from the malignancy of party; that by far the major part of her people were inſpired with the genuine principles of loyalty, and entirely devoted to her ſervice; and engaged, if ſhe would remove from about her perſon the petty tyrants who kept her enſlaved, and engage to call a new parliament, ſuch repreſentatives would be ſent to the houſe of commons, as were the trueſt friends to monarchy, to the eſtabliſhed church, and to the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

Theſe arguments prevailed: the queen determined to ſhake off the yoke of the whigs, and ſupply their places with a tory miniſtry. Accordingly the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate; the earl of Godolphin, lord-treaſurer: the lord chancellor Cowper; the earl of Wharton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; lord Somers, preſident of the council; and ſeveral other whigs, were diſplaced, and their employments enjoyed by their rivals. Other changes followed, till at laſt no whig remained in any place of truſt. The parliament, in which the whiggiſh intereſt had prevailed, was diſſolved, and ſure meaſures were taken for obtaining a parliament of tories.

Though this change was entirely brought about by the intereſt of Mrs. Maſham, yet the trial of Dr. Sacheverel ſeems firſt to have rendered the queen uneaſy with regard to the principles of the whigs, who, in their ſpeeches on that memorable occaſion, had treated monarchical power in ſuch indecent terms, that the queen was alarmed: ſhe found herſelf, according to their doctrine, reduced to a mere ſervant of the people. This determined her to examine the matter to the bottom, and the conſequence was a total change of the miniſtry.

Dr. Sacheverel, whoſe trial had occaſioned ſo much noiſe, a feeble inſtrument in himſelf, but very capable of enflaming the populace, now became one of the principal agents of the court. He was appointed to a living in Wales, and repaired thither in triumph, with a pompous equipage. The univerſity of Oxford treated him as ſome illuſtrious perſonage; and the towns through which he paſſed expreſſed their zeal to do him honour. Thouſands of the populace ran before him with acclamations. The clergy in general encouraged the enthuſiaſm of the people, and every place reſounded with "The church and Dr. Sacheverel." This happened at the time of the general election; and no incident could have been of more advantage to the tories, of whom this parliament was almoſt wholly compoſed.

The new parliament met on the twenty-fifth of November, and on the twenty-ſeventh was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which her majeſty recommended the proſecution of the war with vigour, eſpecially in Spain. She declared ſhe was firmly reſolved to ſupport the church of England, to preſerve the Britiſh conſtitution agreeable to the union, to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to ſcrupulous conſciences, and to employ none but ſuch as were ſincerely attached to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover.

Both houſes preſented very affectionate addreſſes, and the commons voted the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying on the war. They, however, gave ſufficient indications that they were determined to humble the whigs, and ſuffered their writers to abuſe the duke of Marlborough in the moſt outrageous manner. That great general, ſo often extolled by both houſes, ſo reſpectable for his actions, the idol of the army, and the terror of France, now ſuffered the moſt ſhameful indignities, as the reward for his ſervices. So uncertain is the favour of princes, and ſo changeable is the breath of popular fame! The people now inſulted the hero they had before almoſt worſhipped. He was accuſed of pride, avarice, cruelty, violence, extortion, fraud and rapine: even his courage was diſputed in the midſt of his victories. Never had Rome or Athens known popular clamour more abſurd or unjuſt. The parliament enquired, with the ſame partiality, into the unſucceſsful war in Spain. They cenſured the conduct of Galway and Stanhope, and loaded Peterborough, their rival, with encomiums. To blacken the former miniſtry, the houſe reſolved, that thoſe who had ſupported the bill for a general naturalization, in conſequence of which, vaſt numbers of poor Palatines were brought into England, were enemies to the queen and to the nation.

A. D. 1711. A bill paſſed, by which it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould repreſent a county in parliament, who was not poſſeſſed of ſix hundred pounds a year: the repreſentative of a borough was to be poſſeſſed of half that revenue. An attempt was alſo made to exclude merchants from ſitting in the houſe of commons, where the uncommercial landholder was thought to have a prior right.

Though Harley had ſo eminently contributed to bring about the late change in the miniſtry, he ſoon loſt the confidence of the tories, becauſe he was too prudent to join in their violent meaſures. But a dangerous circumſtance ſoon after reſtored his reputation. The marquis de Guiſcard, a French refugee in the Engliſh ſervice, thinking his ſervices not ſufficiently rewarded, made offers to the court of France to furniſh them with ſecret intelligence. His letters were intercepted; he was apprehended, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. St. John, ſecretary of ſtate, and carried before the council for examination. Enraged at this diſcovery, he deſired leave to ſpeak with the ſecretary, probably with an intention to ſtab him. His requeſt was refuſed; and Mr. St. John being at a diſtance from him, he fell upon Mr. Harley, crying, "Then have at thee," ſtabbed him in two places in the breaſt with a pen-knife, and received himſelf ſeveral wounds, of which he died ſoon after in Newgate. The injurious ſuſpicions that had been entertained of the miniſter vaniſhed, when an enemy to the ſtate had attempted his life. The two houſes of parliament paſſed the higheſt encomiums on his loyalty and fidelity. They threw the blame on the papiſts; and the queen cauſed the laws that had been enacted againſt them to be put in execution.

Mr. Harley, on the death of the earl of Rocheſter, became prime miniſter, and was created baron of Wigmore, and earl of Oxford and Mortimer. He now eſtabliſhed a commercial ſociety, under the title of the South-Sea Company, which was to pay off the navy debts by means of the funds aſſigned it. The miniſter imagined, that by the approaching treaty of peace, the company would be permitted to trade to Peru, in the ſouth-ſea. He was miſtaken; the Spaniards never could be prevailed upon to grant any liberty of that kind.

The new miniſtry well knew that it would be impoſſible for them to carry on the war with the ſame advantage as before, unleſs Marlborough continued at the head of the army, and acted with his uſual alacrity. They were therefore determined to bring about a peace. This meaſure appeared the more reaſonable, as the emperor Joſeph being dead, Charles, his brother, was elected to fill the imperial throne; and it was inconſiſtent with the political ſyſtem to unite the Auſtrian power with that of Spain. But the people were ſo intoxicated with victory, and inflamed with the deſire of conqueſt, that it required no ſmall addreſs to inſpire them with pathetic ſentiments. It was firſt neceſſary to awaken their hatred and contempt for the late miniſtry, the authors of a war as uſeleſs as it was glorious. The commons very readily ſeconded the views of the court. In a remonſtrance to the queen, they ſaid they had diſcharged the heavy debts of the ſtate; that on enquiring into the cauſes of theſe debts, they had diſcovered frauds and iniquitous employment of the public money: that thoſe who directed the adminiſtration during the preceding years, had omitted to give account of more than thirty millions which had paſſed through their hands; that their pernicious practice had ruined England; and that without the intervention of her majeſty's prudence, the evil would ſoon become irremediable. They therefore prayed the queen, that thoſe whom they had accuſed might be brought to account. This remonſtrance produced the deſired effect. The late miniſtry was rendered ſo odious, that every meaſure contrary to theirs was approved. It is not uncommon for the people to become dupes to political artifice.

Marlborough, though he had loſt his power in the cabinet, was ſtill at the head of the allied army, and appeared again with applauſe on the theatres of his victories. The lines which marſhal Villars had formed to ſecure his army were thought impenetrable: he therefore bid defiance to all the efforts of the Engliſh general. Theſe lines began at Bouchain on the Scheld, and were continued along the Sanſet and the Scharpe to Arras; and thence along the Upper Scharpe, and the Ugy to the Canche, the openings between theſe rivers being intrenched and fortified with the utmoſt art and care. But difficulties only ſtimulated Marlborough to overcome them. He determined to make himſelf maſter of the French lines, and ſucceeded in a moſt extraordinary manner. By a feigned march he ſo artfully diverted the attention of Villars, that he entered the lines near Arleux, almoſt without oppoſition, on the fourth of Auguſt. This was juſtly conſidered as the boldeſt attempt that had been made during the whole war; and the honour of it was the greater to the duke of Marlborough, as his army was not only weakened by a large detachment which prince Eugene had carried to the Rhine, but by the calling over five thouſand of the beſt troops in his army for an expedition intended to be undertaken by ſea; ſo that the troops of the enemy were ſuperior in number to his own. This raiſed his reputation beyond all he had done formerly; it was conſidered as a maſter-piece of generalſhip, which had hardly ever been exceeded. Villars, on the contrary, was not only cenſured for his conduct at Paris, but even ridiculed by his own officers. Marlborough immediately diſpatched brigadier Sutton to London with the news that he had made himſelf maſter of the French lines, without the loſs of a man, though the enemy had boaſted they were impenetrable.

Marlborough now determined to beſiege Bouchain, contrary to the opinion of the deputies of the ſtates-general, who thought the attempt too difficult. The town was ſituated in the middle of a moraſs, ſtrongly fortified, well ſupplied with proviſions and ſtores, and defended by a numerous garriſon. Add to this, that Villars with an army ſuperior in number to that of the allies, was encamped within a mile of the town. The place was inveſted on the tenth of Auguſt by thirty battalions and twelve ſquadrons, commanded by general Fagel. The ſiege was puſhed with the utmoſt vigour, and the town ſoon laid in ruins by the artillery and bombs. Marſhal Villars attempted to raiſe the ſiege, but in vain. Marlborough had taken his meaſures ſo well, that his deſigns were rendered abortive; and the place ſurrendered on the thirtieth of Auguſt. Nor could the garriſon obtain any better terms than that of being priſoners of war.

This was the laſt ſervice the great Marlborough ever performed in the field. The allies were now in poſſeſſion of the Maeſe almoſt to the influx of the Sambre, of the Scheld beyond Tournay, and of the Lys as far as it is navigable. Beſides the conqueſts in Germany they had alſo reduced ſo much of Guelderland, as had formerly been left to Spain by the treaty of Munſter; and likewiſe Limburg, Brabant, Mechlin in Flanders, two thirds of Hainault with their fortreſſes, the conqueſt of which was thought almoſt impracticable. By the taking of Bouchain, and the progreſs of the confederate army on the Scharpe and the Lys, they were become maſters of two rivers, which, by means of the Deule and its canal, had been ſerviceable to the French for many years in their continual invaſions of the Spaniſh Netherlands, of which they were wholly deprived. All theſe important conqueſts the allies had made during the courſe of this war, under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough; who, having given orders for ſecuring the navigation of the Scharpe to Douay, and covering the workmen employed in fortifying ſeveral poſts on that river and on the Scheld, left the army, and after a ſhort ſtay at the Hague, landed in England on the ſeventeenth of November.

A negotiation for a peace with France had been negotiating during the laſt ſummer; and the preliminaries offered by that power had been approved of by the Engliſh miniſtry, and the city of Utrecht appointed for holding the conferences. On the ſeventh of November her majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe obſerved, “That notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delighted in war, the time and place for a general congreſs were finally appointed: that her allies, eſpecially the ſtates-general, whoſe intereſt ſhe conſidered as inſeparable from her own, had, by their ready concurrence, expreſſed an entire confidence in her conduct: that her chief concern was, that the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation ſhould be preſerved inviolate, by ſecuring the ſucceſſion as it was limited by parliament, in the houſe of Hanover: that ſhe ſhould uſe all her endeavours, in the enſuing negotiation, to obtain all the advantages of trade and commerce, which a tender and affectionate ſovereign could procure for a dutiful and loyal people: that with regard to the princes and ſtates who were engaged in the war, ſhe would leave no means unattempted to obtain for each of them all reaſonable ſatisfaction: that as the beſt way to forward the treaty would be to make early proviſion for opening the campaign, ſhe hoped they would grant the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year; and begged they would proceed in this affair with ſuch diſpatch, as might convince the enemy, that if ſhe could not obtain a good peace, ſhe was ready to proſecute the war with vigour.”

Satisfied that while Marlborough continued at the head of the army, the ſtrongeſt oppoſition would be made to the offers of peace, the miniſtry determined to ſtrip him of all his poſts. The committee for examining the public accounts, having proved that he had received annually a conſiderable ſum from the victuallers of the army, the queen declared in council, that in order to enquire impartially into that affair, ſhe thought it neceſſary to remove him from all his employments. This declaration was the next day imparted to him in a letter wrote by the queen's own hand, in which ſhe took occaſion to complain of the treatment ſhe had received from him and his friends. It was now ſufficiently evident what reliance is to be placed on the favour of the people, when the object, however deſerving, is no longer in power. That great general, whom they had ſo lately in a manner deified and adored, and whoſe glorious actions filled every mouth with praiſes, was now become the object of the moſt indecent ſatire, and the moſt bitter invectives. He who had ſo lately poſſeſſed the favour and confidence of almoſt every power in Europe, now found himſelf unable to oppoſe the envenomed ſhafts of deſtructive party.

But notwithſtanding the miniſtry had found means to deſtroy the power of Marlborough, they perceived that it would be impoſſible to procure the approbation of the houſe of lords to the intended peace, unleſs ſome method could be found to turn the majority in favour of the court, it being now ſufficiently evident that it was in favour of the other party. Accordingly the queen was perſuaded to create no leſs than twelve new peers; a number which the miniſtry imagined would ſecure them the majority in the upper houſe.

A. D. 1712. While theſe meaſures were in agitation, prince Eugene arrived in England, and was introduced by Mr. ſecretary St. John to a private audience of her majeſty. After a ſhort compliment, which her majeſty very graciouſly returned, he delivered to her a letter from the emperor, which he deſired her majeſty to peruſe, as it contained the whole purport of his viſit to her court. After reading the letter, the queen was pleaſed to tell the prince, "that ſhe was extremely ſorry the ſtate of her health did not permit her to ſpeak ſo often as ſhe could wiſh with his highneſs; but that ſhe had ordered her ſecretary and treaſurer to receive his propoſals, and confer with his highneſs as frequently as he ſhould think proper."

Eugene ſtill treated Marlborough with the ſame reſpect as if he had been ſtill in favour. Oxford inviting him one day to dinner, congratulated himſelf with being honoured with the preſence of the greateſt general in Europe. "If I am the greateſt general," anſwered the prince, "it is to you I am indebted for the favour." This ſpirited compliment was undoubtedly due to Marlborough, whom Oxford's miniſtry had diſgraced.

Mr. ſecretary St. John immediately acquainted the commons, that he had received her majeſty's commands to lay before the houſe a propoſition made her by prince Eugene, in the name of the emperor, for ſupporting the war in Spain. The ſubſtance of it was, "That his imperial majeſty judges that forty thouſand men will be ſufficient for this ſervice; and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to about four millions of crowns, towards which his imperial majeſty offers to make up the troops he has already in that kingdom, to thirty thouſand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himſelf.

This propoſal was received with great coldneſs in the houſe of commons; ſo that though Eugene was received with all the honours due to his birth and merit, he ſaw no proſpect of ſucceeding. He therefore haſtened back to the continent, to take upon himſelf the command of the army, in which he had now no competitor for glory. In the mean time, the trial of Marlborough was deferred; but notwithſtanding all the regard and friendſhip Eugene ſhewed for that great leader, the commons kept no meaſures with the duke. They accuſed him of malverſation; and it is certain that too great a thirſt of wealth had ſullied the glory of that illuſtrious general. But that glory, and his eminent ſervices, were ſurely ſufficient to have thrown a veil over a few failings, eſpecially as he had it in his power to juſtify his conduct by orders from the miniſtry. He was, however, unwilling to enflame the nation, and prudently ſought refuge in foreign countries, to elude a proſecution carried on by a party who could not bear to ſee him any longer in power, or even enjoy, unmoleſted, the rewards of his victories.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, ſome bills were paſſed, which muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence. The duke of Hamilton, a Scottiſh peer, demanded his ſeat in the houſe of lords, in quality of duke of Brandon. The queſtion was, whether Scottiſh peers, created peers of England ſince the union, had a right to a ſeat in parliament. Though there had been already a precedent favourable to the duke, the queſtion was carried in the negative by five voices. All the peers that voted for the queſtion proteſted againſt the deciſion, and the Scotch lords complained with the greateſt acrimony. The bill for occaſional conformity, ſo long oppoſed by the whigs, and deſired by the church of England, paſſed into a law, but in a more moderate form than that in which it had been before propoſed. The naturalization bill, which had occaſioned ſuch prodigious numbers of poor proteſtant foreigners to ſettle in England, was annulled; it having been found, that the idle and the indigent were as great a burden to the ſtate as the induſtrious were a benefit. A bill alſo paſſed in favour of the epiſcopalians, who were always precluded from toleration in Scotland. This was a dreadful mortification to the preſbyterians; and their reſentment was raiſed to the higheſt pitch, when an order was publiſhed for ſhutting the courts of judicature during the Chriſtmas holidays, which they conſidered as a relic of popery. "As the houſe will make no alteration in the bill," ſaid one of the members, "I ſubmit; but deſire it may be intitled, A bill to eſtabliſh jacobitiſm and licentiouſneſs of manners."

The Dutch having ſhewn evident ſigns of diſpleaſure at the peace now in agitation, the commons, in revenge, attacked the treaty concluded ſome years before with the ſtates, by which the barrier was granted to them in the Low Countries. They repreſented to the queen, in a ſtudied remonſtrance, "that Holland had not furniſhed her contingent of troops, and that England had been overcharged nineteen millions during the war. The ſtates general publiſhed a memorial in vindication of their conduct; and the commons voted it a ſcandalous libel, injurious to the houſe, and tending to alienate the minds of the people from the preſent government. Such untoward incidents formed the prelude to the approaching peace.

But notwithſtanding theſe alarming appearances, the conferences were opened at Utrecht with all the appearance of ſucceſs. The emperor and the ſtates-general continued obſtinate to their propoſals, and were for reducing Lewis XIV. to the moſt humiliating conceſſions. The Britiſh miniſtry therefore found it abſolutely neceſſary to carry on the treaty without them, or break off the negotiation. The French now delivered their ſpecific explanation of the offers for a general peace. Theſe were tranſmitted to London, and, as far as they related to Great-Britain, were as follow:

"The French king will acknowledge, at the ſigning of the peace, the queen of Great-Britain in that quality; as alſo the ſucceſſion of that crown according to the preſent ſettlement, and in the manner her Britannic majeſty ſhall pleaſe.

"His majeſty will cauſe all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demoliſhed immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his ſatisfaction.

The iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, Hudſon's Bay, and ſtreight of that name, ſhall be yielded up entire to the crown of Great-Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, ſhall be reſtored entire to her majeſty.

As to the iſland of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that alſo to Great-Britain, reſerving only to himſelf the port of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fiſh, as before the war.

"It ſhall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce, before or after the peace, as England ſhall chuſe; the conditions of which ſhall be made as equal as poſſible between the two nations."

Theſe offers were treated as trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majeſty and her allies, by ſeveral members in the houſe of peers. Some endeavours were made to adjourn the debates, but in vain; and it was reſolved, without a diviſion, to addreſs the queen, repreſenting the juſt indignation the houſe entertained at the inſolence of France, in having propoſed to acknowledge her majeſty's title to theſe realms no ſooner than when the peace ſhould be ſigned; as alſo at the terms of peace offered to her and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France; declaring, at the ſame time, that they would aſſiſt her majeſty to the utmoſt of their power in proſecuting the war, until they ſhould obtain a ſafe and honourable peace.

The duke of Ormond having been appointed commander in chief of the Engliſh forces, in the room of the duke of Marlborough, paſſed over to the continent in the beginning of April; and on the twentieth of May, his grace, in concert with prince Eugene, aſſembled the army between Douay and Marchienes, where it was found, upon a review, that the allied army conſiſted of one hundred and twenty-two thouſand two hundred and fifty men. Prince Eugene ſoon after propoſed to attack the French army under marſhal Villars, or to inveſt the town of Queſnoy; but Ormond, who had now received freſh orders from Mr. ſecretary St. John, gave the prince and deputies of the ſtates-general to underſtand, that her Britannic majeſty, having a proſpect that the negotiations for a peace would prove ſucceſsful, had commanded him not to act offenſively againſt the enemy.

Alarmed at this unexpected refuſal, the ſtates-general not only complained to the Britiſh miniſters at the congreſs, but alſo ſent over a letter to the queen, ordering their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. It contained an excuſe for the backwardneſs they had ſhewn in acting in concert with her majeſty. They ſaid, “ That all the difference between the queen and them, was a diſparity of ſentiments; and if for ſuch a cauſe, confederates united by the ſtrongeſt ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come. The Dutch envoy alſo received orders to publiſh copies of this letter in the public papers. This was accordingly done, and they were printed and diſperſed at the very time when the letter came to the queen's hand.

Incenſed at theſe proceedings, which were conſidered as a remonſtrance rather than a repreſentation, and an appeal to the people than an addreſs to the ſovereign, the queen wrote a very ſharp letter to the ſtates. At the ſame time, the commons voted an addreſs to her majeſty, wherein they aſſured her, “ of the juſt ſenſe the houſe had of the indignity offered to her majeſty, by printing and publiſhing a letter from the ſtates-general; and humbly deſired, that ſhe would ſo far reſent ſuch indignities, as to give no anſwers for the future to any letters or memorials that ſhould be ſo printed and publiſhed.”

Lewis had loſt the dauphin, his only ſon, the duke of Burgundy his grandſon, the eldeſt of the duke of Burgundy's children; and the duke of Anjou, now on the Spaniſh throne, was threatened with approaching death. From theſe misfortunes there was great reaſon to fear that the crowns of France and Spain would be ſoon united. The concluſion of the treaty, the ſecret articles whereof were regulated by the two courts of France and England, depended upon this renunciation. Experience had, indeed, taught, that very little reliance could be placed on ſuch renunciations; but it was hoped, that in caſe of neceſſity, this would be inſiſted on by all the powers intereſted in preſerving the balance of Europe. Philip V. yielded to neceſſity; and the queen agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms. Orders were immediately ſent to the duke of Ormond to put an end to hoſtilities. The queen laid the plan of the treaty before the parliament; and notwithſtanding all the efforts of the whig party, the two houſes preſented addreſſes to her majeſty, wherein they declared at once their gratitude and approbation.

When the duke of Ormond abandoned the allies, Eugene was employed in the ſiege of Queſnoy. Almoſt all the foreign troops in Engliſh pay refuſed to follow him; ſo ſtrong were their ideas of new triumphs, and of humbling the enemy in the duſt. Lewis agreed to give up Dunkirk as a pledge to the Engliſh for his engagements, and waited with impatience the events of a critical campaign. Eugene took Queſnoy, and beſieged Landreci; while detachments from his army ravaged the country, and the kingdom of France was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion. But the lines of Eugene were too much extended. Villars forced the entrenchments of general Albemarle, who was encamped at Denain, and the prince was unable to give him any aſſiſtance. He took Marchienes, where the magazines of the allies were formed; raiſed the ſiege of Landreci; retook Douay, Queſnoy, and Bouchain; and in one campaign became ſuperior to the conqueror, ſo long fluſhed with victory.

A. D. 1713. The allies began now to perceive that all their efforts, without the aſſiſtance of England, would be in vain: they therefore came into the meaſures of England; and the famous treaty of Utrecht was ſigned on the firſt of April. By this treaty, the French king acknowledged the proteſtant ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great-Britain; and engaged for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, not to ſuffer the pretender to return into France, nor any way to ſuccour or aſſiſt him.

“ That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united under one head; that renunciations ſhould be made by both ſides in due form; and that they ſhould never be united under any pretence whatſoever.

“ That the trade between France and Spain ſhall be on the ſame footing as in the time of Charles II.

“ That the fortifications of Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. That the bay and ſtreights of Hudſon ſhould be reſtored, and ſatisfaction be made to the company for the damages they had ſuſtained.

“ That the whole iſland of St. Chriſtopher ſhould be hereafter poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and alſo Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

“ That the iſland of Newfoundland ſhould belong wholly to Great-Britain; the French having only huts for drying their fiſh, and liberty to fiſh only from Cape Bona Viſta to the northern point of that iſland, and ſo down the weſtern ſide as far as port Roche. But the French were to retain Cape Breton, and other iſlands in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence.

“ That the French in Canada ſhould not moleſt the five nations of Indians ſubject to Great-Britain; nor the ſubjects of Great-Britain moleſt the Indians under the protection of France.

“ That all letters of marque, counter-marque and repriſal, be annulled.

“ That juſtice ſhall be done to the Hamilton family with regard to the dutchy of Chatelrault; to the duke of Richmond, concerning ſuch requeſts as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, with regard to certain lands to be reclaimed by him.”

The treaty having been laid before the parliament, and approved of, the queen came to the houſe of peers on the ſixteenth of July, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I come now to put an end to this ſeſſion with great ſatisfaction, and return you all my hearty thanks for the good ſervice you have done to the public.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I muſt particularly thank you for the ſupplies you have now given: I will take care to apply them, as far as they will reach, to ſatisfy the ſervices you have voted.

“ I hope, at the next meeting, the affair of commerce will be ſo well underſtood, that the advantageous conditions I have obtained from France will be made effectual for the benefit of our trade.

“ I cannot part with ſo good and loyal a houſe of commons, without expreſſing how ſenſible I am of the affection, zeal, and duty, with which you have behaved yourſelves; and I think myſelf therefore obliged to take notice of thoſe remarkable ſervices you have performed.

“ At your firſt meeting, you formed a method, without farther charge to my people, to eaſe them of the heavy load of more than nine millions; and the way of doing it may bring great advantage to the nation.

"In this ſeſſion you have enabled me to be juſt in paying the debts of my ſervants.

"And as you furniſhed ſupplies for carrying on the war, ſo you have ſtrengthened my hands, by obtaining a peace.

"Thus you have ſhewed yourſelves the true repreſentatives of my loyal commons, by the juſt regard you have paid to the good of your country, and my honour. Theſe proceedings will, I doubt not, preſerve the memory of this parliament to poſterity.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"At my coming to the crown, I found a war prepared for me. God hath bleſſed my arms with many victories, and at laſt has enabled me to make them uſeful by a ſafe and honourable peace.

"I heartily thank you for the aſſiſtance you have given me therein, and I promiſe myſelf, that, with your concurrence, it will be laſting.

"To this end I recommend it to you all, to make my ſubjects truly ſenſible what they gain by the peace; and that you will endeavour to diſſipate thoſe groundleſs jealouſies, which have been ſo induſtriouſly fomented among us, that our unhappy diviſions may not weaken, and, in ſome ſort, endanger, the advantages I have obtained for my kingdoms.

"There are ſome (very few I hope) who will never be ſatisfied with any government: it is neceſſary, therefore, that you ſhew your love to your country, by exerting yourſelves to obviate the malice of the ill-minded, and to undeceive the deluded.

"Nothing can eſtabliſh peace at home, nothing can remove the diſorders that have happened during ſo long a war, but a ſteady adhering to the conſtitution in church and ſtate.

"Such as are true to theſe principles, are only to be relied on; and as they have the beſt title to my favour, ſo you may depend upon my having no intereſt or aim but your advantage, and the ſecuring of our religion and liberty.

"I hope, for the quiet of theſe nations, and the univerſal good, that I ſhall next winter meet my parliament, reſolved to act upon the ſame principles, with the ſame prudence, and with ſuch vigour, as may enable me to ſupport the liberties of Europe abroad, and reduce the ſpirit of faction at home."

Few ſpeeches ever delivered from the throne have been more reflected upon than this. It ſeemed ſtrange, that the queen, who did not pretend to underſtand trade, ſhould paſs ſuch a cenſure upon both houſes, for not being wiſer in that particular than herſelf; eſpecially as it appeared, from the information given at the bar of both houſes, and the debates which enſued upon it, that the treaty, with regard to commerce, was ſo oppoſite to the intereſt of England, that it ſeemed to be a contempt on their underſtanding to repreſent it as advantageous, and to rank all thoſe who oppoſed it among the ill-minded, or at leaſt among the deluded. Nor did her aſſerting the nation to be eaſed of nine millions, without any farther charge, eſcape cenſure; becauſe it was well known the nation muſt ſupport the conſtant burden of intereſt at ſix per cent. till the capital was paid off.

The emperor Charles VI. refuſed to enter into the negotiations, but had ſoon cauſe to repent of his obſtinacy. Marſhal Villars, having nothing to fear in Flanders, marched towards the Rhine, took Landau and Friburgh, and defeated a conſiderable body of German troops. Charles then deſired peace, and at laſt obtained it by the treaty of Redſtadt, but on leſs advantageous conditions than he might have acquired, had he joined the allies in their negotiations at Utrecht. He might then have had Landau, and, poſſibly, Straſburg; but he knew not when to ceaſe hoſtilities in the moſt profitable manner.

A. D. 1714. In the beginning of the year, the ratifications of the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Spain were brought over to England, and peace was proclaimed on the firſt of March. The following are the chief articles in this treaty: That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united: that the proteſtant ſucceſſion ſhould be acknowledged, and never be oppoſed on any pretence: that navigation and commerce ſhould be on the ſame footing as in the treaty of 1667: that no licence ſhould be given to the French, or other nations, to introduce negroes, or any merchandiſes, into the Spaniſh dominions in America, except what might be agreed on by the treaty of commerce, and the privilege granted by the aſſiento of negroes; except alſo what ſhould be granted by the catholic king, after the aſſiento ſhould be determined: that the American dominions ſhould not be alienated from the crown of Spain, to France, or any other nation: that Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca ſhould be given up to England for ever: that no Moors were to come thither but on account of traffick: that all the Spaniſh inhabitants ſhould enjoy their eſtates and religion, or have liberty to ſell their eſtates, and retire: that the South-ſea company ſhould have the privilege of introducing negroes into ſeveral parts of America for thirty years, commencing with the year 1713, in the ſame manner as enjoyed by the French: that the Catalans ſhould have a full and free pardon, with the poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, and enjoy the ſame privileges with the inhabitants of both Caſtiles: that Sicily ſhould be yielded to the duke of Savoy; but in caſe of his dying without heirs, the kingdom ſhould return to Spain. By two ſeparate articles, the queen promiſed to perſiſt in the meaſures, by which ſhe had taken care, that no other part of the Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be torn from it; and obliged herſelf to procure the princeſs Urſini to be put into poſſeſſion of Limburg, or ſome other country in the Netherlands, which ſhould produce thirty thouſand crowns a year, purſuant to a grant made her by king Philip in the year 1711.

The parliament had been opened by commiſſion ſome time before this peace was publiſhed; but the day after, her majeſty repaired to the houſe of peers, and delivered the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have much ſatiſfaction in being able, at the opening of this parliament, to tell you, that the ratifications of the treaties of peace and of commerce with Spain are exchanged, by which my ſubjects will have greater opportunities than ever to improve and extend their trade. Many advantages formerly enjoyed by connivance, and procured by ſuch methods as made a diſtinction between one Britiſh merchant and another, are now ſettled by treaty, and an equal rule is eſtabliſhed.

"It hath pleaſed God to bleſs my endeavours to obtain an honourable and advantageous peace for my own people, and for the greateſt part of my allies. Nothing that I can do ſhall be wanting to render it univerſal; and I perſuade myſelf, that, with your hearty concurrence, my interpoſition may at laſt prove effectual to complete the ſettlement of Europe.

"In the mean while, I congratulate with my own ſubjects, that they are delivered from a conſuming land war, and entered on a peace, the good effect whereof nothing but inteſtine diviſions can obſtruct.

"It was the glory of the wiſeſt and greateſt of my predeceſſors to hold the balance of Europe, and to keep it equal by caſting in their weight as neceſſity required. By this conduct, they enriched the kingdom, and rendered themſelves dreadful to their enemies, and uſeful to their friends. I have proceeded on the ſame principles, and I doubt not but my ſucceſſors will follow theſe examples.

"Our ſituation points out to us our true intereſt; for this country can flouriſh only by trade, and will be moſt formidable by a right application of our naval force.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered ſuch accounts to be prepared and laid before you, as will ſhew you, at the concluſion of the war, the true ſtate of your condition; whereby you will be better able to judge what aids are neceſſary; and I only aſk of you ſupplies for the current ſervice of the year, and for the diſcharge of ſuch debts as you ſhall find, on examination, to be juſt and reaſonable.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The joy which has been generally expreſſed on my recovery from my late indiſpoſition, and on my coming to this city, I eſteem as a return for that tender affection which I have always had for my people.

"I wiſh that effectual care had been taken, as I have often deſired, to ſuppreſs thoſe ſeditious papers and factious rumours, by which deſigning men have been able to ſink credit, and the innocent have ſuffered.

"There are ſome who have arrived to that height of malice, as to inſinuate, that the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover is in danger under my government.

"Thoſe who go about thus to diſtract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, can only mean to diſturb the preſent tranquillity, and bring real miſchief upon us.

"After all I have done to ſecure our religion and your liberties, and to tranſmit both ſafe to poſterity, I cannot mention theſe proceedings without ſome degree of warmth; and I muſt hope you will all agree with me, that attempts to weaken my authority, or to render the poſſeſſion of the crown uneaſy to me, can never be proper means to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

"I have done, and ſhall continue to do my beſt for the good of all my ſubjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it ſhall be mine, to unite our differences, not by relaxing from the ſtricteſt adherence to our conſtitution in church and ſtate, but by obſerving the laws yourſelves, and enforcing a due obedience to them in others.

"A long war has not only impoveriſhed the public, (however ſome particular men may have been gainers by it) but has alſo greatly affected government itſelf.

"Let it be your care ſo to improve the preſent opportunity, as to lay the foundation of recovering from thoſe diſorders.

"I had the concurrence of the laſt parliament in making the peace. Let it be the honour of this to aſſiſt me in obtaining ſuch fruits from it as may not only derive bleſſings on the preſent age, but even down to the lateſt poſterity."

This ſpeech produced ſome debates in both houſes; but addreſſes of thanks were voted both by the lords and commons; and the queen, after thanking the lords for their affectionate addreſs, added, "That they who were neareſt the throne would firſt of her ſubjects feel the evil conſequences of any diminution of the regal authority: that it was a comfort to her ſhe had the aſſurance of their ſupport; and they might depend upon it, ſhe would never give way to the leaſt attempt on the juſt authorities of the crown, or any of their rights and privileges."

The next day the convocation complimented the queen in a joint addreſs "on her recovery and happy return to her royal city in health and ſafety;" concluding with their wiſhes, "That after a long and happy reign, ſhe might be able to tranſmit the protection of the church and ſtate to a proteſtant ſucceſſor in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, which her majeſty, to the great ſatisfaction and comfort of all her faithful and good ſubjects, had ſo often declared to be at her royal heart."

The lords taking the ſtate of theſe kingdoms into conſideration, the leaders of the whigs repreſented the danger that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, on account of the pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of peace, and moved, that addreſſes be preſented to the queen, "Firſt for an account of what ſteps had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, and what anſwers had been given by that duke. Secondly, an account of the negotiations of peace: what meaſures had been taken to render the peace univerſal: and what obſtructions her majeſty had met with. Thirdly, an account of what inſtances had been made for reſtoring the Catalans their ancient privileges, and all letters relating to that negotiation. Fourthly, an account of the monies granted ſince the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal." Theſe addreſſes were preſented without oppoſition. But the miniſtry perceiving that the whigs were forming ſeveral other motions which could not fail of greatly embarraſſing their meaſures, the lord-treaſurer moved to adjourn the houſe till the thirty-firſt of March, which was carried by a ſmall majority.

Though the miniſtry had increaſed their party during the receſs of parliament, yet the debates were carried on with as much zeal as ever in the houſe of lords; and the papers addreſſed for being laid before the houſe, the whigs repreſented, "That the crown of Great-Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the houſe of Auſtria, and engaged to ſupport them, thoſe engagements ought to be made good." To this lord Bolingbroke anſwered, "that the queen had uſed all her endeavours to procure to the Catalans the enjoyment of their ancient liberties and privileges; but that after all, the engagements ſhe had entered into, ſubſiſted no longer than while Charles was in Spain; but that prince being advanced to the imperial dignity, and having himſelf abandoned the Catalans, ſhe could do no more than interpoſe her good offices in their behalf, which ſhe had not been wanting to do." To this it was replied, "That God had put more effectual means into her majeſty's hands."

After ſome other ſpeeches, earl Cowper moved for an addreſs to the queen, importing, "That her endeavours for preſerving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of their ancient liberties, being proved ineffectual, their lordſhips made it their humble requeſt, that ſhe would continue her interpoſitions in the moſt preſſing manner in their behalf." The miniſtry perceiving that it would be in vain to oppoſe the motions of the whigs; the addreſs was agreed to.

Still no ſatisfactory account was given with regard to the preſent reſidence of the pretender, who was ſaid ſtill to continue in Lorrain. The earl of Sunderland ſaid, "that notwithſtanding the earneſt application made laſt ſeſſion by both houſes to her majeſty, to uſe her utmoſt endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was aſſured by baron Foſtner, the duke of Lorrain's miniſter, ſome weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no inſtances had yet been made to his maſter for that purpoſe." To this lord Bolingbroke anſwered, "He wondered baron Foſtner could make ſuch a declaration, ſince he himſelf had made thoſe declarations to him in the queen's name." But lord Halifax confirmed what the earl of Sunderland had advanced by ſaying, "That baron Foſtner had told him as much but four days before; ſo that lord Bolingbroke muſt be miſtaken, at leaſt in point of chronology."

This debate brought on a motion of more conſequence; the queſtion was "whether the proteſtant ſucceſſion be in danger under the preſent adminiſtration? This queſtion gave riſe to a very warm debate, which continued for near ſeven hours, during which time many warm ſpeeches were made againſt the miniſtry. That of the earl of Angleſea was remarkable. He ſaid, among other things, "That when he came into the houſe, he thought indeed the proteſtant ſucceſſion to be ſtill in danger on the part of France, whoſe intereſt it was to reſtore the pretender: But that after he had heard what ſo many noble members of that auguſt aſſembly, perſons of undoubted honour and probity, had alledged againſt the miniſters, and no anſwer offered to confute it, either by the miniſters themſelves or their friends, he could not but believe the ſucceſſion to be in danger." He afterwards endeavoured to clear himſelf with regard to the ſhare he had in ſome late tranſactions. "I own," ſaid he, "I gave my aſſent to the ceſſation of arms, for which I take ſhame to myſelf, and aſk God, my country, and my conſcience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit, till that noble lord (turning towards the lord treaſurer) had aſſured the council, that the peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her majeſty and her allies." Adding, "That as the honour of his country, and the good of his ſovereign, formed the rule of his actions, ſo he had no reſpect of perſons; and if he found himſelf impoſed upon, he durſt purſue an evil miniſter from the queen's cloſet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the ſcaffold." The lord-treaſurer, againſt whom the latter part of his ſpeech was levelled, ſaid, "That the peace was as glorious and advantageous as could be expected, conſidering the neceſſity of affairs, and the oppoſition the queen's miniſters had met with, both at home and abroad." Several lords replied, that no miniſters ever had it in their power to make ſo honourable and advantageous a peace as the queen's miniſters had. The duke of Argyle added, "That he had lately croſſed the kingdom of France, both in going to and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the fineſt countries in the univerſe, but that there were marks of a general deſolation in all the places through which he paſſed. That he had rid forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: that the reſt of the people were in the utmoſt miſery and diſtreſs; and therefore he could not apprehend what neceſſity there was to conclude a peace ſo precipitately with a prince whoſe dominions were ſo greatly exhauſted of men, of money, and of proviſions." With regard to the queſtion in debate he ſaid, "That he firmly believed the ſucceſſion of the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover to be in danger from the preſent miniſters, whom he durſt charge with mal-adminiſtration both within doors and without: that he knew, and offered to prove, that the lord-treaſurer had yearly remitted four thouſand pounds to the highland clans in Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the pretender, in order to keep them under diſcipline and ready for any attempt: that, on the other hand, the new-modelling of the army, by diſbanding ſome regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vaſt number of officers merely on account of their known affection for the houſe of Hanover, were clear indications of the deſigns in hand: that it was a diſgrace to the nation to ſee men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the poſts of ſeveral brave officers, who, after they had often expoſed their lives for their country, were now ſtarving in priſon for want of their pay." The lord-treaſurer now roſe, and laying his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid, "I have, on ſo many occaſions, given ſuch ſignal proofs of my affection to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, that I am ſure no member of that auguſt aſſembly could call it in queſtion. At the ſame time I own I have remitted to Scotland, for two or three years paſt, three thouſand eight hundred pounds to the highland clans; but I hope the houſe will give me an opportunity of clearing my conduct with regard to that point. As for the reformed officers, I have given orders they ſhall be paid directly."

After ſeveral other ſpeeches the queſtion was put and carried in the negative by twelve voices only. But though the proteſtant religion was thus voted not to be in danger, lord Hallifax, in order to put their profeſſions of affection for the houſe of Hanover to the teſt, moved, "That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, that ſhe would renew her inſtances for the ſpeedy removing the pretender out of Lorrain; and that ſhe would, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, enter into the guaranty of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover; and alſo with ſuch other princes as ſhe ſhould think proper." He was ſeconded by the earl of Wharton, who moved likewiſe, that in the addreſs, "Her majeſty might be deſired to iſſue a proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon who ſhould bring the pretender dead or alive:" this motion was ſeconded by the duke of Bolton, who alſo moved, that the reward might be ſuitable to the importance of that ſervice. Nothing was ſaid in oppoſition to the motions: but it being late, ſome members expreſſed their deſire that the houſe ſhould adjourn. But the other ſide calling for the queſtion, it was unanimouſly reſolved that the addreſs ſhould be preſented.

When the addreſs againſt the pretender was reported by the committee appointed to draw it up, the lord North and Grey made a long ſpeech, "Wherein he endeavoured to ſhew the barbarity of ſetting a reward upon any man's head; which, he ſaid, was nothing leſs than giving encouragement to murder and aſſaſſination; and how repugnant ſuch a practice was to the laws of chriſtianity, the law of nature, and the laws of all civilized nations." He repreſented in particular, "How inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of ſo auguſt an aſſembly in a nation and government, famed for lenity and clemency." He concluded with ſaying, "No man either had more reſpect for the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, or would do more to ſecure them than himſelf; but that they muſt excuſe him, if he would not incur perdition for them." He was ſupported by lord Trevor, who ſaid, "What that noble peer had ſpoke was ſufficient to ſhew, how inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with chriſtianity, and the civil law; and therefore he would confine himſelf to the laws of England; and, if he knew or underſtood any thing of theſe, he was confident they were no leſs oppoſite to ſuch proceedings than the civil law. He knew he did not ſpeak there as a lawyer or judge, but as a peer: but he was ſo fully ſatisfied of our law diſcountenancing all ſuch proceedings, that if ever ſuch a caſe ſhould come before him as a judge, he ſhould think himſelf bound in juſtice, honour, and conſcience, to condemn ſuch an action as murder; and therefore he hoped the ſupreme court of judicature in England, and the moſt auguſt tribunal in the univerſe, would not make a precedent for encouraging aſſaſſination;" and therefore he moved, "that the reward ſhould be for apprehending and bringing the pretender to juſtice, in caſe he ſhould land, or attempt to land, either in Great Britain or Ireland: and that her majeſty ſhould iſſue her royal proclamation, whenever in her great wiſdom ſhe ſhould judge it neceſſary." To this it was anſwered, "That however contrary ſuch a proceeding might be to the precepts of chriſtianity, it was warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the moſt civilized nations in Europe, and of our own nation in particular. For without recurring to remoter inſtances, we have the example of king James II. who ſet a a price on the head of his own nephew, the duke of Monmouth." But theſe reaſonings were not well ſupported, and the motion was agreed to by a majority of ten voices. When the addreſs was preſented to the queen, ſhe returned the following anſwer:

"My lords,

"It would be a real ſtrengthening to the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, as well as a ſupport to my government, that an end were put to theſe groundleſs fears and jealouſies, which have been ſo induſtriouſly promoted.

"I do not, at this time, ſee any occaſion for ſuch a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be neceſſary, I ſhall give my orders for having one iſſued.

"As for the other particulars in this addreſs, I will give proper directions therein."

This anſwer revived the hopes of the pretender's friends, who, before the late warm ſpeeches were made againſt him in the upper houſe, were ſo elated, that an agent from king James' queen, had attempted to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded, in her name, the ſum of ſix hundred and fifty thouſand pounds a year, ſince the death of James II. But the agent having in the bill given her the title of queen-mother, the officer refuſed to file it; upon which the agent changed the title, and preſented it in the name of "the moſt illuſtrious princeſs Maria, relict of James II. king of England." Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, purſuant to a formal agreement made in France by lord Bolingbroke, about fifty thouſand pounds were remitted thither for her uſe.

The very day the addreſs was preſented an incident happened, which threw the miniſtry into the utmoſt confuſion. Moſt of the whig lords had held a conſultation at the houſe of lord Hallifax, to which baron Schutz, envoy from the elector of Hanover was admitted. In this meeting it was reſolved, that the baron ſhould take the firſt opportunity of demanding a writ for the electoral prince to ſit in the houſe of peers, as duke of Cambridge. Accordingly Scutz made a viſit to the chancellor, and among other civilities acknowledged the affection he had ſhewn on ſeveral occaſions to the houſe of Hanover. The chancellor told him, "he was extremely ſenſible of the honour he did him by his viſit and compliment; and deſired him to aſſure the elector of his entire devotion to his ſervice; hoping his highneſs gave no credit to the falſe reports that were induſtriouſly ſpread, in order to give him jealouſies of her majeſty's miniſters." The baron anſwered that he would not fail to diſcharge ſo agreeable a commiſſion; but he had a favour to aſk of him, in the name of the electoral prince, that his lordſhip would be pleaſed to make out a writ for his ſitting in the houſe of peers as duke of Cambridge. Surprized at this unexpected demand, the chancellor told the baron, "That though it was unuſual to make out writs for peers who were not in the kingdom, yet he would immediately apply to her majeſty for directions." The baron anſwered, "he did not doubt his lordſhip's performing the duties of his office. But, with regard to the objection of the duke's being out of the kingdom, he could aſſure him his electoral highneſs propoſed coming over very ſpeedily, and might perhaps be landed before the writ was made out." The baron now took his leave, and the chancellor deſired him to remember, "That he did not refuſe his demand, but thought proper to acquaint the queen of it, which he would do immediately." A council was directly held in the queen's preſence, and after very long debates it was reſolved, that the chancellor ſhould make out a writ for the duke of Cambridge. The queen was, however, ſo highly offended at the baron's making his application to the chancellor, before he had informed her of his intentions, that ſhe forbade him the court.

But though the writ was ordered to be made out for the duke of Cambridge, the miniſtry was determined he ſhould not viſit England; and a report prevailing that the princeſs Sophia intended to deſire the queen's approbation for the duke of Cambridge's coming into England, her majeſty, with the advice of her cabinet council wrote that princeſs the following letter:

"Madam, Siſter, Aunt.

"Since the right of ſucceſſion to my kingdom has been declared to belong to you and your family, there have alway's been diſaffected perſons, who, by particular views of their own intereſt, have entered into meaſures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am living. I never thought till now, that this project would have gone ſo far, as to have made the leaſt impreſſion on your mind. But, as I lately perceived, by public rumours, which are induſtiouſly ſpread, that your electoral highneſs is come into this ſentiment, it is of importance, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion of your family, that I ſhould tell you ſuch a proceeding will infalibly draw along with it ſome conſequences, that will be dangerous to that ſucceſſion itſelf, which is not ſecure any other way, than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her prerogative. There are here (ſuch are our misfortunes) a great many people, that are ſeditiouſly diſpoſed. So I leave you to judge what tumults they may be able to raiſe, if they ſhould have a pretext to begin a commotion. I perſuade myſelf, therefore, you will never conſent, that the leaſt thing ſhould be done, that may diſturb the repoſe of me and my ſubjects.

"Open yourſelf to me with the ſame freedom I do to you, and propoſe whatever you think may contribute to the ſecurity of the ſucceſſion, I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity which I am reſolved to maintain. I am with a great deal of affection, &c.

At the ſame time her majeſty wrote the following letter to the duke of Cambridge:

"Couſin,

"An accident which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from ſetting forward ſo ſoon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with reſpect to the deſign you have formed of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of this matter ought to have been firſt to me; ſo I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendſhip I have for you, and the electoral houſe to which you belong; and the true deſire I have, that it may ſucceed to my kingdom: and this requires of me that I ſhould tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in your line, and conſequently more diſagreeable to me, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture.

"I am, &c."

Theſe letters greatly affected the princeſs Sophia, who was now in the eighty-fourth year of her age, that the very day after ſhe had received them, ſhe was ſeized with an apoplectic fit as ſhe was walking in the gardens of Herenhauſen, and died in the arms of the electoral princeſs, before phyſicians could come to her aſſiſtance. She was the fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederick, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth of England only daughter of James I. This princeſs was of a ſtrong and healthy conſtitution, and a perfect miſtreſs of moſt of the modern languages; her genius was equally turned for converſation or buſineſs, and hence ſhe became at once the ornament and delight of her court. her turns of wit were ſprightly and ſurprizing; her judgment ſolid and penetrating. Nothing could exceed the beauties and advantages of her converſation, but her letters; both were eaſy, entertaining and uſeful. She enjoyed a fund of happineſs within herſelf, which gave a reliſh to her retirements: but her care in government and œconomy ſhewed the juſt ſenſe ſhe entertained of being born for the good of others. Her piety was exemplary without affectation; and her ſentiments of religion juſt and noble. She lived beloved, and her hearſe was bedewed with the tears of the good and the virtuous.

Bolingbroke and the other leaders of the tory party, determined, if poſſible, to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion, brought in the famous ſchiſm bill, it being thought neceſſary for accompliſhing their ſcheme, to ruin the diſſenters. It was preſented to the houſe of commons by Sir William Windham, and ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the whole power of the whig party; but paſſed the houſe by a conſiderable majority.

When it was read the firſt time in the houſe of peers, lord Bolingbroke ſaid, "It was a bill of the laſt importance, ſince it concerned the ſecurity of the church of England, the beſt and firmeſt ſupport of the church and monarchy; both which all good men, and particularly that auguſt aſſembly, who derive their luſtre from and are near the throne, ought to have moſt at heart, and therefore he moved that it ſhould be read a ſecond time." Lord Cowper replied, "That no man was more ready than himſelf to do every thing that ſhould appear neceſſary to attain the ſeeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of ſchiſm, and the further ſecuring the church of England. But that the enacting part would be ſo far from anſwering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to church and ſtate. That inſtead of preventing ſchiſm, and enlarging the pale of the church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inſeparable attendants, ſuperſtition and irreligion. That in many country towns, reading, writing and grammar ſchools were chiefly ſupported by the diſſenters; not only for the inſtruction and benefit of their own children, but likewiſe of thoſe poor churchmen; ſo that the ſuppreſſing thoſe ſchools, would, in ſome places, ſuppreſs the reading of the Holy Scriptures." On the other hand he obſerved, "that this bill ſtruck at the ancient rights and prerogative of the houſe of peers; which, by the conſtitution, is the ſupreme court of judicature, and the dernier reſort in all cauſes; whereas, by this bill, the juſtices of the peace were impowered to hear and finally determine the offences againſt the ſame. I would, my lords, added he, rather enlarge than abridge the power of juſtices of the peace, were it only to encourage gentlemen to take upon them an office ſo troubleſome, and ſo unprofitable, unleſs it be, perhaps, in the county of Middleſex. But, at the ſame time, my lords, I ſhall never conſent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this auguſt aſſembly, of which I have the honour to be a member."

The earl of Wharton attacked the ſupporters of the bill with the moſt poignant irony. "I am," ſaid he, "agreeably ſurprized to ſee ſome men of pleaſure become on a ſudden ſo religious, as to ſet up for patrons of the church. But I am aſtoniſhed that perſons who have been educated in diſſenting academies, whom I could point out, and whoſe tutors I could name, ſhould appear the moſt forward in oppreſſing them. This is ſurely but an indifferent return for the benefit the public has received from thoſe ſchools, which have bred thoſe great men, who have made ſo glorious a peace, and treaties that have executed themſelves. I can therefore ſee no reaſon for ſuppreſſing theſe academies, unleſs it be from an apprehenſion, that they may ſtill produce greater geniuſes, that may drown the merits and abilities of theſe great men. To be ſerious, my lords, it is no leſs melancholy than ſurprizing, that at a time when the court of France proſecutes the deſign they have long ſince formed to extirpate our holy religion; when not only ſecret practices are uſed to impoſe a popiſh pretender on theſe realms, but men are publickly inliſted for his ſervice: it is, I ſay, melancholy and ſurprizing, that at this very time a bill ſhould be brought in, which muſt tend to divide the proteſtants; and conſequently to weaken their intereſt, and haſten their ruin. But the wonder will ceaſe when we conſider, that madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill." He declaimed particularly againſt the word ſchiſm, with which the frontiſpiece of the bill was decorated, and ſaid, "It is ſomething ſtrange that they ſhould call ſchiſm in England, what is the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland; and therefore, if the lords who repreſented the nobility of that part of Great Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that in order to be even with us, and conſiſtent with themſelves, they would move for bringing in another bill to promote the growth of ſchiſm in their own country." He added, "That both in the bill itſelf, and alſo in the ſpeeches of thoſe who had declared for it, ſeveral laws were recited and alledged, but there was a law which had not yet been mentioned, it is the law of the goſpel, To do unto others as we would be done unto."

Several other very remarkable ſpeeches were made on this remarkable bill, and ſeveral amendments were made to it, which rendered it very different from what it appeared in its original ſtate. With theſe amendments it was carried in the houſe of peers by a majority of five voices, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

The houſe ſeemed now determined to cenſure the conduct of lord Bolingbroke; but the queen in order to prevent the conſequences that might enſue, came to the houſe of Lords on the ninth of July, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech, from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The progreſs which has been made in public buſineſs, and the ſeaſon of the year, render it both convenient and neceſſary, that I ſhould put an end to this ſeſſion.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

"I return you my hearty thanks for all your good ſervices to me and to your country, and particularly for the ſupplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year, as towards the diſcharging of the national debt. In our preſent circumſtances it could not be expected, that a full proviſion ſhould be made on both theſe heads. What you have granted ſhall be laid out with the beſt huſbandry, and to the greateſt advantage.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in ſuch a temper as is neceſſary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is to preſerve to you, and to your poſterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my ſubjects, and to procure the preſent and future tranquillity of my kingdom. But I muſt tell you plainly, that theſe deſirable ends can never be attained, unleſs you bring the ſame diſpoſitions on your parts; unleſs all groundleſs jealouſies, which create and foment diviſions among you be laid aſide: and unleſs you ſhew the ſame regard for my prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expreſſed for the rights of my people."

This was the laſt ſpeech the queen ever made to her parliament: her conſtitution was now quite broken; one fit of ſickneſs ſucceeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health, was the diſcords that prevailed among her miniſters. While the parliament continued ſitting, they maintained ſome appearance at leaſt of unity; the fear of an attack from that branch of the legiſlature; but their fears being now over, they laid no reſtraint upon their paſſions. Their diſputes became intolerable; they ſo far forgot their duty to her majeſty, and regard for their country, that whenever Oxford and Bolingbroke met in council, they ſtudied rather to oppoſe each other, than to ſettle or purſue any regular plan of government. And their jealouſies arrived at laſt to ſuch a ſhameful height, that it is believed a quarrel that happened between them in the queen's preſence, haſtened her death. It is certain that the ſevereſt reproaches paſſed between theſe miniſters on the twenty-ſeventh of July, when Oxford was deprived of the white ſtaff. He imputed his diſgrace to Bolingbroke, lady Maſham, and the chancellor, and told them, in the queen's preſence, "That he had been wronged and abuſed by lies and miſrepreſentations; but he ſhould be revenged, and leave ſome people as low as he found them." Theſe expoſtulations could not fail of ſhocking the queen, whoſe ill ſtate of health rendered her incapable of ſupporting ſuch unexpected ſtrokes of fortune. She could not help reflecting that ſhe muſt have been abuſed by ſome, if not by all her principal miniſters; and ſhe actually intimated to one of her phyſicians, that ſhe ſhould not long ſurvive it.

She was ſoon after ſeized with a lethargic diſorder, and the next day was ſtruck with an apoplexy. She, however, recovered, in ſome degree, the uſe of her ſenſes, and during that interval, gave the white ſtaff to the duke of Shrewſbury, bidding him uſe it for the good of her people. This was the laſt act of her government, dying on the firſt of Auguſt, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign.

Few ſovereigns ever merited higher eulogiums than this princeſs, without either great talents or a cultivated mind, and without ſpirit ſufficient to give her an aſcendant over her favourites. She ſhone in the qualities of the heart, a ſincere piety, a ſteady virtue, a tender affection for her ſubjects, an invariable affability, as well in government as in civil life. From theſe qualities which will render her name reſpectable, ſhe was called "The good queen Anne;" a title more glorious than all the victories that adorned her reign.

Queen Anne had ſix children, but none ſurvived her. The duke of Glouceſter only reached his twelfth year, all the reſt died very young.

From the Acceſſion of George I. to the Concluſion of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748.

GEORGE I.

A. D. 1714. THE death of the queen diſconcerted all the ſchemes of the tories. Bolingbroke was left without power, and conſequently incapable of executing the deſigns he had formed. His genius, more brilliant than ſolid, was not calculated for the government of a nation. The Jacobites had flattered themſelves that hereditary right would prevail in favour of the pretender, over the motives which had excluded that family from the crown of England. They were deceived, and George I. was proclaimed without oppoſition. The proteſtant ſucceſſion had been too firmly eſtabliſhed by acts of parliament to be ſhaken by the attempts of a few perſons; who were no friends to the peace of their country.

George I. was in the fifty-fifth year of his age, when queen Anne ſunk into the grave. He was endowed by nature with an extenſive genius, which had been cultivated by an excellent education; which, together with his experience, rendered him perfectly capable of ſupporting the weight of a crown, to which he was now called by the voice of the people. He had long been known to the Engliſh, having commanded a body of troops in the allied army, where his valour and conduct had gained him univerſal eſteem.

The king was proclaimed on the firſt of Auguſt, at the uſual places, and with the uſual ceremonies, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter. The ſtreets were crowded with multitudes of people; for having been born and educated in the boſom of the proteſtant church, all who wiſhed well to the eſtabliſhed religion in England, had fixed their hopes on him for the preſervation of their conſtitution both in church and ſtate.

The ſame ceremonies was performed in all the cities and towns in England without the leaſt diſturbance any where except at Oxford, where a perſon, in the habit of a ſtudent, brought a letter to the mayor, requiring him to proclaim the pretender. The mayor communicated the letter to the vice-chancellor, and both of them tranſmitted copies of it to Mr. ſecretary Bromley, repreſentative for the univerſity of Oxford, who returned them letters of thanks. In the mean time, the vice-chancellor offered a reward of a hundred pounds for diſcovering the author.

All poſſible precautions had been taken by the lords of the regency, to guard againſt a ſurprize. They diſpatched ſuch officers of the army as they knew they could truſt to their reſpective poſts; gave orders to reinforce the garriſon at Portſmouth, and ſent veſſels out to view the harbours of France and diſcover whether any preparations were making for an invaſion of this kingdom. They choſe Mr. Joſeph Addiſon for their ſecretary, and ordered all letters and diſpatches directed to the ſecretary of ſtate to be ſent to him. This was a mortifying circumſtance to lord Bolingbroke, who was now obliged to ſtand at the door of the council-chamber, with his bag and papers, and to receive orders from thoſe, whom, but a few days before, he expected to command.

Both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter on the very day the queen died, and a ſpeech was made by the chancellor in the name of the lords-juſtices, ſuitable to the occaſion of their meeting. Both houſes voted addreſſes of condolance and congratulation to the king. The commons actually made good all funds which had been granted by parliament, for the ſecurity of any money that had or ſhould be advanced for the public ſervice. Theſe addreſſes being tranſmitted to the king, his majeſty returned very affectionate anſwers.

M. d'Iberville, the French miniſter, having for ſome time behaved in a very haughty manner, was, on the queen's death, ſo apprehenſive of being inſulted by the people, that he ſent a letter to the duke of Ormond, deſiring his protection. The duke laid the letter before the lord-juſtices, who ordered a party of the trained-bands to guard his houſe. He had already aſſured the regency, "That his maſter would inviolably maintain the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht, particularly with regard to the ſettlement of the crown in the houſe of Hanover." And the earl of Peterborough, who arrived in London from France on the ſeventh of Auguſt, informed the regency, that the French king had given him the ſame aſſurances. Some days after Iberville received a letter from the marquis de Torcy, approving of his conduct, and another from his maſter Lewis XIV. to the Britiſh regency, containing the ſame declaration. That monarch alſo declared, "That having been informed of ſome reports, which hinted his having deſigned to make ſome alterations in the late treaty, he thought proper to declare, as he had already done to the earl of Peterborough, that theſe reports were altogether falſe and groundleſs: that the king of Spain having ſent the cardinal del Guidice as ambaſſador to Franec, which might create ſome ſuſpicions, his moſt chriſtian majeſty, had deſired the king his grandſon, to recal him: and that the elector of Brunſwick having, ſome time before the death of the queen, ſignified that whenever his acceſſion to the crown of Great Britain ſhould take place, he would cultivate an acquaintance with France, his moſt chriſtian majeſty, on his part, aſſured the lords-juſtices, that he would do all that lay in his power to maintain a good intelligence and amity between the two crowns."

But ſenſible how little dependence could be placed on the French king's aſſurances, they exerted all their power to put the nation in a poſture of defence, as the only way of rendering any deſigns againſt the peace of the realm abortive. While they were thus nobly employed, Mr. Murray arrived with expreſſes from Hanover, informing the regency that his majeſty had deferred his departure for ſome days, and ordered the lords-juſtices to remove lord Bolingbroke from his office of ſecretary of ſtate. This was accordingly done on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, and not without particular marks of diſpleaſure; for the ſeals were not only taken from him, but the doors of his office were locked and ſealed.

The ſudden death of the queen confounded the court of France; they found it was impoſſible for them to oppoſe the proteſtant ſucceſſion to the crown, and therefore they acknowledged George, elector of Hanover, king of Great Britain. The pretender, who had been flattered with the hopes of aſſuming the Engliſh throne, both by the miniſters of France and England, no ſooner heard that the queen was either dead, or paſt all hopes of recovery, than he poſted immediately to Verſailles; but before he reached the palace, he was met by the marquis de Torcy, who told him, "That his moſt chriſtian majeſty was ſurprized at his being returned into his dominions, knowing the engagements he was under, with regard to the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain in the houſe of Hanover; and therefore deſired him to quit his territories immediately." Aſtoniſhed at this unexpected reception, the pretender made a melancholy viſit to the queen-dowager of England, who reſided at Chaillot, and returned to the court of Lorrain at Luneville.

The king landed at Greenwich on the ſixteenth of September about ſix in the evening, where he was received by the duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard, and the lord-chancellor at the head of the lords of the regency. His majeſty choſe to walk to his houſe in the park, accompanied by moſt of the nobility, and great numbers of the principal gentry, through an infinite croud of perſons of all conditions. The parliament had already granted him the ſame revenue enjoyed by the late queen. And inſtead of five thouſand pounds promiſed in the late reign, one hundred thouſand were now offered to any one who ſhould take the pretender in caſe he attempted an invaſion.

The duke of Marlborough was diſtinguiſhed among the croud of courtiers; for king George was both a politician and a ſoldier; and his maxim was, "Never to abandon his friends, to do juſtice to all, and to fear nobody." The king made his public entry on the twentieth of September, with great pomp and magnificence. Above two hundred coaches belonging to the nobility and gentry, all drawn by ſix horſes, preceded the king's. He was met at St. Margaret's-hill in Southwark, by the lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, ſheriffs and officers of the city of London, in whoſe name Sir Peter King, the recorder, made a congratulatory ſpeech. The lord-mayor delivered the ſword to the king, who returned it, and he bore it in the proceſſion.

The animoſity which ſubſiſted between the two parties, was at this time higher than ever. The whigs, who had been in diſgrace during the four laſt years of the queen's reign, were filled with reſentment at the uſuage they had received from the tories, and hoped to have full ſatisfaction under a reign, the commencement of which they conſidered as the end of their humiliation. The tories were apprehenſive of a fall, and this had engaged ſeveral of their leaders in practices not only dangerous, but directly oppoſite to the meaſures for maintaining the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The king, highly eſteemed for his prudence, ſeemed capable of diſtinguiſhing the heats of faction, or at leaſt of turning them to the public good. Poſſibly he might have ſucceeded had he maintained an equal balance between the two parties, and endeavoured to unite them by a proper conduct and addreſs; but whether he thought it impoſſible to reconcile the turbulent paſſions of the two parties, or whether the prejudice he had conceived againſt the tories carried him beyond proper bounds, he gave all his confidence to their adverſaries, who were more devoted to the new government.

This tended only to widen the breach, and increaſe the number of enemies to the principles of the revolution. Not only the papiſts eſpouſed the intereſt of the abdicated family, but alſo great numbers of thoſe who profeſſed the tenets of the church of England; and it was feared they would join with the catholics, to dethrone a prince whom they conſidered as a foreigner. Neither the famous diſtinction between a king de jure and a king de facto, nor the doctrine of paſſive obedience, was yet forgot; and hence ſeveral refuſed to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration.

The changes that enſued were a farther proof that the tories were to expect no favour from the new king. Bolingbroke had been diſmiſſed before his arrival, and lord Townſend appointed ſecretary of ſtate in his room. The command of the army was taken from the duke of Ormond, and reſtored to the duke of Marlborough. The lord Cowper was made lord-chancellor; the earl of Wharton, lord privy-ſeal; and the earl of Sunderland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Devonſhire was appointed ſteward of the houſhold, in the room of earl Paulet; and Mr. James Stanhope, ſecretary of ſtate in the room of Mr. Bromley. The duke of Somerſet was made maſter of the horſe, the duke of St. Albans captain of the band of penſioners, and the duke of Argyle commander in chief of the forces in Scotland. Mr. William Pulteney was made ſecretary at war, and Mr. Robert Walpole receiver and paymaſter-general of all the forces in Great Britain, and paymaſter to Chelſea hoſpital. This revolution extended to other public employments, and the whigs triumphed with as high a hand on this occaſion, as they had before been humbled and diſgraced. Such beginnings could not fail of inflaming the animoſity of parties, and cheriſhing the ſpirit of contention.

The great art of gaining the hearts of the people conſiſts not of obtaining the attachment of a few at the expence of others. George ſhewed more wiſdom in declaring, "that he was reſolved to maintain the churches of England and Scotland as by law eſtabliſhed; that he hoped to ſucceed without infringing that toleration granted to the proteſtant non-conformiſts, a toleration ſo advantageous to commerce and the public welfare; and that he would be particularly careful to ſecure property, that precious right of the ſubject, which eſſentially conſtitutes the happineſs of the nation."

The king was crowned at Weſtminſter on the fifteenth of October, with great magnificence. There was never ſo great an appearance of lords ſpiritual and temporal, as on this occaſion, no leſs than ſeventeen archbiſhops and biſhops, though two ſees were vacant; all the dukes in and about London, except the duke of Buckingham; ſeventy earls and viſcounts, and among them the earl of Oxford and viſcount Bolingbroke, and as many barons. The demonſtrations of joy throughout the kingdom ſeemed to be general on this happy event, ſome few places excepted, where the populace ſhewed their hatred to the proteſtant ſucceſſion by riots and outrages.

One of the principal articles of the treaty of Utrecht preſcribed to Lewis XIV. was the demolition of Dunkirk, a port which had coſt immenſe ſums, and was become an object of jealouſy and terror to the Engliſh, On executing the treaty, the canal of Mardyke was widened, and made a port almoſt equal to that of Dunkirk. Lord Stair, the Engliſh ambaſſador, complained of this in very ſtrong terms. It is ſaid the anſwer made by Lewis was, "I have always been maſter at home, ſometimes abroad; do not make me remember it." Voltaire aſſures us that this anſwer, which he thinks an improper one, did not come out of the mouth of Lewis. But whether this was really the caſe or not, his pride was certainly capable of uttering it. Times were now altered; and the Engliſh obtained ſatisfaction: the works of Mardyke were ſuſpended and afterwards demoliſhed under the regency.

The ſpirit of mutiny ſtill prevailed in the nation. The complaints of the vanquiſhed party echoed from every quarter, and in almoſt every town. The tories did not fail to call in the intereſt of the church as a ſanction to their own. "Down with the whigs! Sacheverel for ever!" was the cry. The pretender, who went by the title of the chevalier de St. George, attempted to avail himſelf of this juncture, by publiſhing a manifeſto, wherein he complained that a foreign prince had been proclaimed, contrary to the fundamental and inconteſtable law of hereditary right; obſerving that no act of parliament could ſet aſide that law, and that his ſubjects, by violating it were no leſs injurious to themſelves than to him.

A. D. 1715. It is natural to ſuppoſe that the king would be very deſirous of having the advice of his parliament. A proclamation was accordingly publiſhed for diſſolving the old and calling a new parliament. This proclamation was filled with complaints againſt thoſe who had ſhewed themſelves diſaffected to the eſtabliſhed government. It was added, "that his majeſty hoped ſuch perſons only would be elected as were capable of putting an end to the preſent diſorders, and that particular attention would be paid to ſuch as had ſupported the proteſtant ſucceſſion when in danger." Nothing could be more clearly pointed out to the whigs, nor mark more ſtrongly on which ſide he wiſhed the votes to fall. A very ſtrong oppoſition was, however, made by the tory party; but the influence of the court, and the ſpirit of liberty among the people, produced the deſired effect: a large majority were on the ſide of the revolution. The new parliament met on the ſeventeenth of March, and the commons having elected Mr. Spencer Compton for their ſpeaker, the ſeſſion was opened on the twenty-firſt, by the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"This being the firſt opportunity, I have had of meeting my people in parliament, ſince it pleaſed God to call me to the throne of my anceſtors, I moſt gladly make uſe of it, to thank my faithful and loving ſubjects for that zeal and firmneſs, which hath been ſhewn in defence of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt all the open and ſecret practices that have been uſed to defeat it; and I ſhall never forget the obligation I have to thoſe, who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon this occaſion.

"It were to be wiſhed that the unparelleled ſucceſſes of a war, which was ſo wiſely and chearfully ſupported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a ſuitable concluſion; but it is with concern I muſt tell you, that ſome conditions, even of this peace, eſſential to the ſecurity and trade of Great Britain, are not yet duly executed, and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious until we have formed defenſive alliances, to guaranty the preſent treaty.

"The pretender, who ſtill reſides in Lorrain threatens to diſturb us, and boaſts of the aſſiſtance which he ſtill expects here, to repair his former diſappointments.

"A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, muſt deſtroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

"The public debts are very great, and ſurprizingly increaſed, ever ſince the fatal ceſſation of arms. My firſt care was to prevent a farther increaſe of thoſe debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ſhips, which had been kept in pay, when there was no occaſion for continuing ſuch an expence.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I rely upon you for ſuch ſupplies as the preſent circumſtances of our affairs require for this year's ſervice, and for the ſupport of the public faith. The proper eſtimates ſhall be laid before you, that you may conſider of them, and what you ſhall judge neceſſary for your ſafety, I ſhall think ſufficient for mine.

"I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the ſupport of the credit of the nation, than a ſpirit obſervance of all parliamentary engagements.

"The branches of the revenue, formerly granted for the ſupport of the civil government, are ſo far encumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remain and have been granted to me, will fall greatly ſhort of what was at firſt deſigned for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown. And ſince it is my happineſs, as I am confident you think it yours, to ſee a prince of Wales, who may, in due time ſucceed me on the throne, and to ſee him bleſſed with many children, the beſt and moſt valuable pledges of our care and concern for your poſterity, this muſt occaſion an expence, to which the nation has not for many years been accuſtomed, but ſuch as ſurely no man will grudge, and therefore I do not doubt but you will think of it with that affection which I have reaſon to hope from you.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the iſſue of this firſt ſeſſion. Let no unhappy diviſions of parties here at home divert you from purſuing the common intereſt of your country. Let no wicked inſinuations diſquiet the minds of my ſubjects. The eſtabliſhed conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhall be the rule of my government. The happineſs, eaſe and proſperity of my people ſhall be the chief care of my life. Thoſe who aſſiſt me in carrying on theſe meaſures I ſhall always eſteem my beſt friends; and I doubt not but I ſhall be able, with your aſſiſtance, to diſappoint the deſigns of thoſe who would deprive me of that bleſſing which I moſt value, the affection of my people."

The addreſſes of both houſes were agreeable to the king's ſpeech. The concluding clauſe by which they declared "they would take ſuch meaſures as would preſerve the public credit, reſtore our trade, extinguiſh the very hopes of the pretender, and recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts; the loſs of which they hoped to convince the world by their actions, is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general," gave occaſion to a very warm debate. The tories alledged "that it was injurous to the late queen's memory, and claſhed with that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, which recommended to both houſes, the avoiding the unhappy diviſions of parties, and that it was unjuſt to condemn perſons without hearing them." Lord Bolingbroke in particular, was very warm on this ſubject, and moved that part of the clauſe might be omitted. But it was carried againſt him, and the addreſs was preſented in its original.

But though lord Bolingbroke ſpoke with great boldneſs in parliament, and appeared every where in public with great boldneſs, yet he did not think proper to ſubmit his conduct to a fair trial. He departed privately from London, and diſguiſed as a ſervant to la Vigne; he paſſed over to the continent, and landed at Calais on the thirtieth of March.

Some of the members had the boldneſs to propoſe an examination of the royal proclamation. Sir William Windham declared it was indefenſible, unprecedented, and of dangerous conſequence to the conſtitution of parliament. The houſe was immediately in a flame, and the cry, "To the tower! to the tower!" reſounded from every corner. He was ordered to withdraw, and one hundred and twenty members accompanied him. The reſt agreed that he ſhould be reprimanded by the ſpeaker, which was done accordingly.

The whigs now determined to enquire into the late negotiations, and a ſecret committee was appointed for that purpoſe. The famous Sir Robert Walpole was appointed chairman; who, after delivering the report, impeached lord Bolingbroke of high-treaſon, as the author of a particular treaty concluded with Lewis XIV. Lord Coningſby immediately roſe, and ſaid, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand; I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk; I the judge: he the ſcholar; I the maſter. I impeach Robert Harley, earl of Oxford, of high-treaſon, and other crimes and miſdemeanors. Mr. Harley, the earl of Oxford's brother, ſpoke in his defence. He alledged, "that the miniſter had done nothing but by the immediate order of the queen; that the peace of Utrecht was an advantageous peace, and, as ſuch, it had been approved by two parliaments."

On the twenty-firſt of June, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope impeached James duke of Ormond of high-treaſon, and other high crimes and miſdemeanors. The duke was defended by ſeveral members. Sir Joſeph Jekyll in particular ſaid, "That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be ſhewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had, in a courſe of many years, exerted thoſe great accompliſhments for the good and honour of his country: that as the ſtatute of Edward III. on which the charge of high-treaſon againſt him was founded, had been mitigated by ſubſequent acts, the houſe ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act againſt the duke, but only to impeach him of high crimes and miſdemeanors. This occaſioned a long and warm debate; but the queſtion being put, it was carried for his impeachment. The duke perceiving he was already pre-judged by his enemies, who were determined to carry on the impeachment with the whole force of their party, conſulted his own ſafety, by withdrawing himſelf from the kingdom.

The articles being agreed to by the commons, lord Coningſby, attended by moſt of the members who had voted for the impeachment, went up to the lords, and, at the bar of the houſe, impeached Robert earl of Oxford of high-treaſon; demanding, at the ſame time, that he might be ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to ſafe cuſtody. The earl, after proteſting his innocence, and obſerving, that, if miniſters of ſtate, who only executed the orders of their ſovereign, were reſponſible for their conduct, every member of that houſe might one day be expoſed to the ſame misfortunes. He added, "My lords, I am about to take my leave of your lordſhips and this honourable houſe, perhaps for ever. I ſhall lay down my life with pleaſure, in a cauſe favoured by my dear royal miſtreſs. When I conſider that I am to be judged by the juſtice, honour and virtue of my peers, I ſhall acquieſce, and retire with great content: and, my lords, God's will be done."

He was ſuffered to return to his own houſe, in cuſtody of the black rod, in conſequence of his being ill of the gravel. The next day he was brought to the bar of the houſe, where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his anſwer. But he was ordered immediately to the Tower, notwithſtanding his bad ſtate of health. The populace followed him in crowds, inveighing againſt his perſecutors.

Theſe rigorous proceedings increaſed the popular ferments. London and Weſtminſter had a little before been filled with tumults. The populace, on the king's birth-day, burnt William in effigy, and inſulted the courtiers. The jacobites were in motion in every part of the kingdom; and his majeſty informed the parliament, that the nation was threatened with an invaſion. The habeas corpus act was immediately ſuſpended, and orders were iſſued to arreſt all ſuſpected perſons. A reward of one hundred thouſand pounds was offered to any perſon who ſhould take the pretender, dead or alive. Troops were raiſed, a fleet was equipped, and every neceſſary preparation made for rendering the attempt abortive. The alarm was not without foundation. The tories had held a correſpondence abroad, and the pretender relied on the promiſes of Lewis XIV. but that prince dying on the firſt of September, the face of affairs in that kingdom was totally changed. The regency devolved to the duke of Orleans, who had neither the power nor inclination to ſacrifice the treaſures of the ſtate he governed to ſupport the intereſt of a wretched exile, who had very ſmall hopes of obtaining the crown he claimed as his birth-right.

The jacobites had, however, proceeded too far, to think of retreating; and the earl of Mar erected the pretender's ſtandard on Brae-Mar on the twenty-fifth of September. He afterwards cauſed him to be proclaimed at Caſtletown, Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and ſeveral other places. Several ſuſpected perſons were ſeized, and committed to the caſtle of Edinburgh. Two veſſels found means to elude the vigilance of the Engliſh fleet, and landed ſeveral officers, together with a conſiderable quantity of arms and ammunition, in Scotland. This was, however, the only aſſiſtance the pretender received from France. The regent found it his intereſt to cultivate a friendſhip with the Engliſh miniſtry. The rebels now publiſhed a manifeſto, in which they gave their reaſons for taking up arms; enumerated the grievances of the nation, and promiſed to redreſs them.

About the ſame time, a conſpiracy was formed at Edinburgh for ſurpriſing the caſtle, on the eighth of September, between eleven and twelve at night; but the deſign was rendered abortive by the care and vigilance of Sir Adam Cockburn.

The duke of Argyle being appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, ſet out, on the ninth of September, for that kingdom; and about the ſame time the earl of Sutherland offered his ſervice to go and raiſe the highland clans in the moſt northern counties of Scotland, which was readily accepted, and the Queenborough man of war was appointed to carry him thither. Several other Scottiſh peers, particularly the duke of Roxburgh, the marquiſſes of Anandale and Tweedale, the earls of Selkirk and Loudon, Roſs, Haddington, Forfar, &c. readily embraced this opportunity of ſhewing their loyalty to their king, and zeal for their country.

About this time a dangerous conſpiracy was diſcovered and rendered abortive in England. On the ſecond of September, lieutenant-colonel Paul, who had a company in the firſt regiment of foot-guards, was ſecured, and the next day ſent priſoner to the Gatehouſe. He was charged with enliſting men for the pretender's ſervice, and other treaſonable practices. The titular duke of Powis, a Roman catholic, was committed to the Tower for high-treaſon; and the lords Landſdown and Duplin were alſo taken into cuſtody, and a warrant iſſued for apprehending the earl of Jerſey. At the ſame time, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope acquainted the commons, "that he was commanded by the king to communicate to them, that his majeſty, having juſt cauſe to ſuſpect that Sir William Windham, Sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Hervey, ſen. of Combe, Mr. Thomas Foſter, jun. Mr. John Anſtis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaſton, were engaged in a deſign to ſupport the intended invaſion of this kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them, and deſired the conſent of the houſe, to his cauſing them to be committed and detained, if he ſhould judge it neceſſary." This was unanimouſly agreed to and an addreſs preſented to his majeſty for that purpoſe.

The conſent of the houſe being thus obtained, warrants were immediately iſſued for apprehending the ſix members, two of whom, Hervey and Anſtis, happened to be then in town, were immediately ſecured. Mr. Hervey, ſome few days after, ſtabbed himſelf with a knife, in two or three places of his breaſt; but the wounds did not prove mortal. Mr. Foſter bid defiance to juſtice, and with the aſſiſtance of two Romiſh lords, raiſed a rebellion in Northumberland. Sir John Packington was brought up to town from Worceſterſhire, and after being examined before the council, was honourably diſcharged. Mr. Kynaſton made his eſcape, and colonel Huſke, a captain in the foot guards was ſent down with a meſſenger to apprehend Sir William Windham, in Somerſetſhire. On their arrival, which was about five in the morning, they deſired to ſee Sir William immediately; but the porter told them he was in bed and could not yet be ſpoke with. The colonel told him he came expreſs, and that the perſon with him had a packet of letters of ſuch conſequence, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for him to inform his maſter of their arrival immediately. This alarmed the porter, and Sir William immediately leaped out of bed, and came in his gown to the colonel, who told him he was his priſoner, the meſſenger at the ſame time ſhewing him the badge of his office. Sir William ſaid he readily ſubmitted; but deſired no noiſe might be made to frighten his lady, who was then with child. They now entered a chamber, where the colonel, ſeeing Sir William's coat and waiſtcoat lie, told him he had orders to ſeize all his papers, and that he muſt take leave to ſearch his pockest, where he found a bundle of papers, which he ſecured. Sir William would have diverted him by offering him the keys of his eſcrutores in order to ſearch for more; but the colonel had now ſecured thoſe of the moſt importance. Sir William deſired the colonel would ſtay till ſeven o'clock, when he would order his carriage to be ready; adding, he would only retire and put on his clothes, and take leave of his lady. This was granted; but the colonel ſoon found he had been too complaiſant; Sir William inſtead of returning made his eſcape. On the colonel's return a proclamation was iſſued, promiſing a thouſand pounds reward to any perſon who ſhould apprehend Sir William.

Sir William found it would be in vain to ſecret himſelf, and therefore repaired to London, and ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Hertford, captain of one of the troops of life-guards. After a ſtrict examination before the council, he was committed to the Tower; notwithſtanding the duke of Somerſet offered to bail him. This refuſal ſo irritated the duke, that he immediately reſigned all his places.

On the twenty-firſt of September, the king came to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I am perſuaded you are all by this time very deſirous of ſome receſs, and that it cannot be deferred longer without great inconvenience to your private affairs.

“ But before I can part with you, I muſt return you my moſt ſincere thanks, for your having finiſhed, with ſo much wiſdom and unanimity, what I recommended to your care; and particularly I thank you gentlemen of the houſe of commons, for the proviſion you have made, as well for the ſupport of the honour and dignity of the crown, as for the other neceſſary occaſions of the public; eſpecially for your having done it by means ſo little burthenſome to my people; which I aſſure you recommends the ſupplies to me, above any other circumſtance whatever.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The open and declared rebellion, which is now actually begun in Scotland, muſt convince all, who do not wiſh to ſee us given up into the hands of a popiſh pretender, of the dangers to which we have been and are ſtill expoſed.

“ I thought it incumbent on me to give you the earlieſt notice of the deſigns of our enemies; and I cannot ſufficiently commend the zeal and diſpatch with which you empowered me, at a time when the nation was in ſo naked and defenceleſs a condition, to make ſuch preparations as I ſhall think neceſſary for our ſecurity. You ſhall have no reaſon to repent of the truſt and confidence you repoſe in me, which I ſhall never uſe to any other end, than for the protection and welfare of my people.

“ It was ſcarce to be imagined, that any of my proteſtant ſubjects, who have known and enjoyed the benefits of our excellent conſtitution, and have heard of the great dangers from which they were wonderfully delivered by the happy revolution, ſhould by any arts or management, be drawn into meaſures, that muſt at once deſtroy their religion and liberties, and ſubject them to popery and arbitrary power. But ſuch has been our misfortune, that too many of my people have been deluded, and made inſtrumental to the pretender's deſigns, who had never dared to think of invading us, or raiſing a rebellion, had he not been encouraged by the ſucceſs his emiſſaries and adherents had actually had in ſtirring up riots and tumults, and by the farther hopes they entertain of raiſing inſurrections in many parts of my kingdoms.

“ The endeavouring to perſuade my people that the church of England is in danger under my government, has been the main artifice employed in carrying on this wicked and traiterous deſign. This inſinuation, after the ſolemn aſſurances I have given, and my having laid hold on all opportunities to do every thing that may tend to the advantage of the church of England, is both unjuſt and ungrateful. Nor can I believe ſo groundleſs and malicious a calumny can make any impreſſion on the minds of my faithful ſubjects, or that they can be ſo far miſled, as to think the church of England is to be ſecured by ſetting a popiſh pretender on the throne.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The proofs this parliament has given of their unſhaken duty and affection to me, and of their love and zeal for the intereſt of their country, will recommend you to the good opinion and eſteem of all, who have their religion and liberty truly at heart, and has laid a laſting obligation upon me; and I queſtion not, but by your farther aſſiſtance in the ſeveral counties to which you are going, with the bleſſing of Almighty God, who has ſo frequently interpoſed in favour of this nation, I ſhall be able to diſappoint and defeat the deſign of our enemies.

“ Our meeting again to do buſineſs, early in the next winter, will be uſeful on many accounts, particularly that the ſitting of parliaments may be again brought into that ſeaſon of the year which is moſt convenient; and that as little delay may be given as poſſible to your judicial proceedings; and I ſhall at preſent give ſuch orders to my lord chancellor, as may not put it long out of my power to meet you on any ſudden occaſion.”

The deſigned inſurrection in the weſtern counties was ſo well concerted, and the conſpirators ſo powerful and numerous, that the jacobites at Bath, depending on their majority, openly aſſerted, that the affair of Scotland was only a diverſion to draw the king's troops that way; but that the effectual attempt would ſoon be made in the weſt. The government, however, having received information of the ſecret proceedings of the malecontents, took ſuch meaſures as rendered all their deſigns abortive. Their firſt attempt was intended to be againſt Briſtol, which they propoſed to make a place of arms. This was prevented by the earl of Berkley, lord-lieutenant of the county, and governor of that city, who repaired thither immediately and took the neceſſary precautions for ſecuring that important place. Several perſons were apprehended, and among the reſt Mr. Hart, a merchant, who was charged with having collected a vaſt quantity of warlike ſtores for the uſe of the conſpirators. Beſides part of Lumley's regiment of horſe, and the two battalions of Stanwix and Pocock, who were already in Briſtol, colonel

Chudleigh's regiment of foot marched thither about the beginning of October. At the ſame time lord Windſor's regiment of horſe, and Rich's dragoons, under the command of major-general Wade, marched to Bath, which was both the rendezvous and one of the arſenals of the conſpirators. Upon a ſtrict ſearch the king's officers diſcovered and ſeized eleven cheſts of fire-arms, a hogſhead filled with baſket-hilted ſwords, and another of cartouches, three pieces of cannon and one mortar, which had been buried under ground. About two hundred horſes were ſeized, and eight of the principal leaders.

The diſaffected in the north of England were more ſucceſsful than their brethren in the weſt. Meaſures had been concerted at London by the pretender's friends, ſome time before the inſurrection broke out in Northumberland. The inſurgents received great aſſiſtance from captain John Shaftoe, a half-pay officer, and captain John Hunter, in North Tyne, who had a commiſſion from queen Anne to raiſe an independent company. Beſides theſe was captain Robert Talbot, an Iriſh papiſt, who had been in the French ſervice. He carried an account of the reſolutions formed in London, and by his advice every neceſſary precaution, was taken for preventing any part of their ſcheme from tranſpiring.

The firſt appearance of their riſing in arms was about the latter end of September, when the earl of Derwentwater was informed, that a warrant was iſſued by the ſecretary of ſtate for apprhending him, and that the meſſengers were already in the neighbourhood of Durham. This ſufficiently alarmed the whole party, and a meeting of all the chiefs was held, where it was reſolved to throw off the maſques, and openly declare their intentions. The pretender was accordingly proclaimed in ſeveral towns with the uſual formalities. They did not doubt of being received very willingly into Newcaſtle; but on approaching the town, they were ſurprized to find the gates ſhut againſt them. They marched immediately to Hexham, where they ſeized all the arms and horſes they could meet with and proclaimed the pretender. Here they received advice, that the lord Kenmure, the earls of Nithſdale, Carnwath, and Wintoun, who had taken up arms in the weſt of Scotland, had entered England to join them and advanced as far as Rothbury. They accordingly left Hexham on the nineteenth of October, and after a long march, joined the Scots that night. They all marched the next day to Woller, where they received advice that the highlanders, who had croſſed the Forth under Mackintoſh were marching to join them, upon which they continued their route to Kelſo in Scotland.

The rebellion being thus kindled both in England and Scotland, it was thought proper to demand from the States-general, the ſix thouſand men ſtipulated by treaty. The demand was immediately complied with, and the neceſſary preparations were made for their embarkation. But as it would be ſome time before the Dutch could land in England, Pitt's regiment of horſe, and three regiments of foot, had been ſent for from Ireland, and landed at Cheſter, the beginning of October. Aſſociations were alſo entered into throughout the kingdom for the defence of his majeſty's perſon and gavernment; and the lords-lieutenants of the counties were impowered to form into troops or companies ſuch as ſhould be willing to aſſociate, and to grant them commiſſions in the king's name.

On the twenty-fifth of October, lieutenant general Carpenter, who was ordered to advance againſt the rebels, left Newcaſtle and marched at the head of one regiment of foot and three of dragoons, towards Kelſo, where the rebels ſtill continued. A council of war was immediately called in their camp, and it was reſolved to march directly to Jedburgh. They did not long continue in that place; but by marches and countermarches gave general Carpenter the ſlip, and paſſed into England, reaching Lancaſter on the ſeventeenth of November. On their approach colonel Chartres, who commanded a few troops in that place, propoſed to blow up a fine bridge over which they were to paſs, in order to obſtruct their entry; but the inhabitants oppoſed this propoſition. The colonel therefore thought it adviſeable to leave the town, after having ordered ſome barrels of powder to be thrown into a well in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the rebels. The inſurgents having entered Lancaſter performed the uſual ceremony of proclaiming the pretender, and levying the public revenues. Though the town could eaſily have been made tenable againſt a much greater number of forces than the government could at that time ſend againſt them, and though they expected ſuccours from different quarters, yet they continued no longer in Lancaſter than the ninth, when they left the place, carrying with them ſix pieces of cannon which they found in the town. They directed their march to Preſton, where the horſe arrived the ſame night, but the foot halted about mid-way. They entered the town without oppoſition; Stanhope's regiment of horſe, and a regiment of militia, having thought proper to retire on their approach. Here they were joined by a conſiderable number of gentlemen and their followers, moſt of them Roman catholics. This greatly diſguſted the Scotch party, who flattered themſelves with being joined by the tories.

General Carpenter, being informed that the rebels were in full march towards Lancaſter, reſolved to purſue them with the dragoons only; perſuaded he ſhould be joined by the king's troops in the weſt. He was not miſtaken, and his troops being joined by a conſiderable body under general Willes, they marched to Ribble bridge, fully reſolved to attack the inſurgents in Preſton. The very morning of their arrival general Forſter gave orders for the rebel army to march, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting the king's troops were ſo near. He had depended for intelligence from the gentlemen of Lancaſter, who had promiſed that no party of the king's troops ſhould advance within forty miles of Preſton without his knowledge. He was accordingly ſurprized when he received advice that general Willes was within ſight of the town. He advanced, however, at the head of a party of horſe to view the poſture of the royal forces; and perceiving they were in full march towards him, he returned immediately to the town to give them a warm reception.

The rebels were not in the leaſt diſcouraged; but chearfully made the neceſſary preparations for their defence. They barricadoed the avenues and poſted detachments in the ſtreets, bye-lanes and ſuch houſes as were moſt proper for galling their enemies. The gentlemen volunteers were poſted in the church-yard, under the command of the earls of Derwentwater, Wintoun, Nithſdale, and Kenmure. General Forſter formed four grand barriers; the firſt a little below the church, commanded by brigadier Mackintoſh, and ſupported by the gentlemen volunteers in the church-yard. The ſecond was ſituated at the head of a lane leading to the fields, and commanded by Charles Murray. The third was near a windmill, and commanded by the laird of Mackintoſh. And the fourth in the ſtreet leading to Liverpool; commanded by major Millar and Mr. Douglas. They threw up ſeveral intrenchments in an inſtant, and did every thing in their power to make a ſtout reſiſtance; but were guilty of one capital error, which ſufficiently diſcovered their ignorance or rather infatuation. For in the morning, upon the firſt intelligenee of general Willes's approach, they had detached Macpherſon, at the head of an hundred men to take poſſeſſion of Ribble bridge, which was the only paſs by which the royaliſts could march to Preſton; the river being fordable only in two places, one below, and the other above the bridge, both which could have eaſily been rendered impaſſable. The bridge terminates a long narrow lane, where Oliver Cromwell met with a ſtout reſiſtance from the king's forces. But Mr. Forſter, inſtead of taking advantage of this paſs, which he might eaſily have done to the deſtruction of the royal forces, ordered his detachment to return to the town, and by that means gave general Willes a free paſſage.

The general expected to have met with great oppoſition in forcing the paſs, and made all the neceſſary preparations for that purpoſe; but was greatly ſurprized to find it abandoned. He even ſuſpected there was ſome ambuſcade laid for him, and therefore reſolved to proceed with great caution. After viewing the hedges and laid the way open for the cavalry to enter, he perceived not the leaſt appearance of an enemy. He therefore concluded they had abandoned the town, and were endeavouring, by long marches, to return to Scotland; but in this he was alſo miſtaken; for on his advancing near the town, he perceived them in a proper poſture to give him a warm reception, though in a place where he could attack them with more eaſe than at Ribble-bridge. He immediately prepared for an attack, and diſpoſed his troops in ſuch a manner, as he might beſt annoy them in the town, and prevent their eſcape.

After viewing the diſpoſition of the inſurgents, and finding all the avenues leading to the town ſtrongly barricadoed with two pieces of cannon planted on each, he reſolved to make two attacks at the ſame time. Accordingly a captain and fifty dragoons were drawn out of each of the five regiments, and ordered to attack the avenue leading to Wigan. Another large detachment were ordered to attack the avenue leading to Lancaſter.

The firſt attack was upon that barricade below the church, where old brigadier Mackintoſh commanded. He received the king's troops very gallantly, and with a terrible fire both from the barricade and the tops of the houſes, obliged them to retire to the end of the town. At the ſame time lord Forreſter, who commanded the other detachment, entered the avenue of Wigan, and took poſſeſſion of two large houſes within fifty yards of the barricade, where he poſted his men, finding it impracticable to force the barricade; but from theſe houſes, which overlooked the whole town, he greatly annoyed the enemy; and from thoſe houſes they received the greater part of the damage they ſuſtained during the action. Theſe houſes had been poſſeſſed by the highlanders, when the barricade was commanded by Mackintoſh; but they were called off to ſupport the barricade. This gave the king's troops an opportunity of ſeizing them, and perhaps ſaved the remains of that detachment, which ſuffered very greatly in this bold attack.

The other barricades were attacked with great reſolution, but without ſucceſs; the king's troops being obliged to retire to the extremities of the town, and remain ſatisfied till the next day, night now hindering their farther approaches. Hitherto the rebels appeared to have acted with courage and intrepidity, and to have the advantage ſince they had repulſed the enemy in every attack, with very little loſs to themſelves, and conſiderable ſlaughter on the ſide of the royaliſts. But they did not long continue in their reſolution to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity; for being informed next morning that general Carpenter was arrived with a reinforcement of troops to ſurround them, their courage failed them; and from that moment they acted with great irreſolution, and deſpaired of ſucceſs.

About ten in the morning general Carpenter, accompanied by the earl of Carliſle, lord Lumley, and colonel Darcy, arrived at Preſton, and marched himſelf to the Mancheſter ſide. He found that the rebels had been attacked the day before without ſucceſs, and that moſt part of the king's horſe and dragoons were crouded together in a deep narrow lane near the end of the town, in ſo incommodious a manner, that it was impoſſible to draw up above three or four in front; and on viewing the ground towards the river, he ſaw that there were no troops poſted at the end of Fiſher-gate-ſtreet, to block up that part of the town, where ſeveral of the rebels were ſaid to have eſcaped the night before. This ſtreet leads to a marſh or meadow, which joins to that part of the river Ribble, where there were two good fords, being the high road towards Liverpool; and towards the end of the ſame ſtreet, there was another barricade mounted with two pieces of cannon. General Carpenter therefore ordered colonel Pitt to poſt his two ſquadrons on that marſh; and going back to the end of the town, he ordered a communication to be made for the troops to aſſiſt each other, in caſe of a ſally from the rebels. Inveſted on all ſides, and ſenſible, when too late, of their condition, the inſurgents began to conſider what was to be done. The highlanders were for ſallying out upon the king's forces, and dying like men of honour, ſword in hand; but they were over-ruled, and not allowed to make any ſally. The motion was not indeed communicated to the whole body; a capitulation having been propoſed by general Forſter, as it was expected good terms might be obtained from the king's officers. Colonel Oxburgh offered to go to the head quarters of the royaliſts and treat for a ſurrender. He accordingly repaired to general Willes, and offered to lay down their arms and ſubmit, on his promiſing to recommend them to his majeſty's mercy. The general told the colonel he could not treat with rebels; for as they had killed ſeveral of the king's ſubjects, they muſt expect to ſuffer the ſame fate. The colonel replied, that he hoped as he was a man of honour and an officer, he would not put perſons to death who were willing to ſubmit. Willes anſwered, all he could do for them was, that if they laid down their arms and ſubmitted themſelves priſoners at diſcretion, he would prevent the ſoldiers from cutting them in pieces, till he had received farther orders; adding, that he would give them no more than an hour to come to a final reſolution. Oxburgh returned into the town to acquaint Mr. Forſter of the general's anſwer. The Scots were very unwilling to accept of ſuch conditions, and Willes conſented to allow them a longer time to give their anſwer. At laſt they agreed to ſurrender themſelves priſoners at diſcretion.

The ſame day the rebels ſurrendered at Preſton, the battle of Dumblain was fought, between the earl of Mar, who commanded the inſurgents, and the duke of Argyle, commander in chief of the royal army. The duke's forces, amounting to three thouſand five hundred men, were drawn up upon the heights above Dumblain, having that town at about a mile and a half on his left, and a wet boggy moraſs, called Sheriff-moor, on his right.

The earl of Mar's army, amounting to about nine thouſand men, were drawn up oppoſite the royal army. Mar, who knew his number was much greater than Argyle's, extended his lines as far as poſſible, in order to take him in flank, and in this diſpoſition advanced to the attack.

Argyle, who till now ſuppoſed that Sheriff-moor was unpaſſable, ſaw that two or three night's froſt had rendered it capable of bearing. At the ſame time he perceived the rebels coming down the moor with an intent to flank him, having their right extended a conſiderable diſtance beyond the point of his left. He found himſelf therefore obliged to alter the diſpoſition of his front, to prevent his being ſurrounded; which, on account of the ſcarcity of general officers, was not ſo eaſily done. The battle was very obſtinate and very bloody; different accounts were given of it, and both ſides claimed the victory. But from the conſequences, it appeared that it was really on the ſide of the royaliſts. The earl of Mar retreated to Perth, and abandoned the deſign he had formed of croſſing the Forth and joining his ſouthern neighbours; nor was it ever after attempted. About eight hundred of the rebels were ſlain on the field of battle, and eighty-two taken priſoners, among whom were ſeveral perſons of diſtinction.

The loſs of this battle, and the caſtle of Inverneſs, which was taken from them ſoon after, greatly intimidated the rebels. The earl of Seaforth, and the marquis of Huntley, left the rebels to defend their own territories; but were ſoon after obliged to make their ſubmiſſion. The marquis of Tullibardine alſo left the army; and many of the clans, ſeeing no likelihood of coming to an action, returned to their reſpective habitations.

On the twelfth of November general Captain Williamſon arrived at Whitehall with the news that the barrier-treaty was ſigned. And three days after general Cadogan, with the Dutch troops, arrived in England, and marched immediately to Edinburgh. General Cadogan ſet out immediately for Scotland, a reſolution having been taken to diſlodge the rebels from Perth. A conſiderable train of artillery was alſo ſhipped at the Tower and ſent to Scotland for the uſe of the army.

On the twenty-third of December the pretender landed at Peterhead in the north of Scotland, with only ſix gentlemen in his retinue; among whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, ſon to the duke of Berwick. He repaired directly to Perth, where he appeared in public, and was proclaimed with great ſolemnity. He publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, and the ſoldiers were employed in fortifying the town; but on the approach of the Engliſh and Dutch forces under the command of general Cadogan, he abandoned Perth and retired to Dundee, and afterwards to Montroſe; where, finding the royal army were in full march after him, he embarked on the ſixteenth of January on board a ſmall veſſel which landed him and his attendants in France. The principal officers in the rebel army followed his example, and paſſed over to the continent.

Such was the iſſue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families; and which, inſtead of promoting the intereſt of the Stuart family, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover.

A. D. 1716. On the ninth of January the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when his majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The zeal and affection to my government, and the vigilant care for the ſafety of the nation, which you have ſhewn in your reſpective counties, have not only anſwered my expectations, but give me aſſurances that you are met together, reſolved to act with a ſpirit becoming a time of common danger, and with ſuch a vigour as will end in the confuſion of all thoſe who have openly engaged in this rebellion, and in the ſhame and reproach of ſuch as, by ſecret and malicious inſinuations, have fomented, or by an avowed difference, encouraged theſe traiterous enterprizes.

"It is, I doubt not, a great ſatisfaction to you to have obſerved, that the powers you entruſted me with for the preſervation of the public ſafety, have been employed in the moſt proper and effectual manner, and made ſtrictly ſubſervient to thoſe purpoſes only for which you intended them. And you muſt have had the pleaſure to reflect with me, that as the meaſures taken for our defence have been juſt and neceſſary, ſo it has pleaſed the divine providence to bleſs them with a ſeries of ſuitable ſucceſs. And I cannot but take this opportunity of doing juſtice to the officers and ſoldiers of the army, whoſe brave and faithful diſcharge of their duty, has diſappointed our enemies, and contributed ſo much to the ſafety of the nation.

"I did hope that the detecting and preventing the deſigned inſurrections in ſome parts of the kingdom, and the defeating in others, thoſe who had taken up arms againſt me, would have put an end to this rebellion. But it is plain that our enemies, animated by ſome ſecret hopes of aſſiſtance, are ſtill endeavouring to ſupport this deſperate undertaking, and the pretender, as I have reaſon to believe, is now landed in Scotland.

"It is, however, with pleaſure I can acquaint you, that notwithſtanding theſe inteſtine commotions, Great Britain has, in ſome meaſure, recovered its influence and reputation abroad. The treaty for ſettling the barriers for the Netherlands, is now fully concluded, between the emperor and the ſtates-general under my guaranty. The king of Spain has agreed to a treaty, by which that valuable branch of our commerce will be delivered from the new impoſitions and hardſhips to which it was ſubjected by the late treaties; and will ſtand ſettled for the future on a foot more advantageous and certain than it ever did in the moſt flouriſhing time of any of my predeceſſors; and the treaty for renewing all former alliances between the crown of Great Britain and the ſtates-general, is brought very near to its concluſion.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I muſt rely on your affection to me, and your care and concern for the ſafety of the nation, to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as may enable me to reſtore and ſecure the peace of the kingdom, and I will order eſtimates of the expences to be laid before you.

"Among the many unavoidable ill conſequences of this rebellion, none affects me more ſenſibly than that extraordinary burden, which it has, and muſt create to my faithful ſubjects. To eaſe them as far as lies in my power, I take this opportunity of declaring, that I will freely give up all the eſtates that ſhall become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, to be applied towards defraying the extraordinary expences incurred on this occaſion.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is a matter of the greateſt uneaſineſs to me, that the firſt year of my reign, the whole courſe of which I wiſh to have tranſmitted to poſterity, diſtinguiſhed by the fair and endearing marks of peace and clemency, ſhould be clouded and overcaſt with ſo unnatural a rebellion, which, however impotent and unſucceſsful, a due care may render it, in all other reſpects, does moſt ſenſibly afflict me, by the calamities it has brought on many of my faithful ſubjects, and by thoſe indiſpenſible returns of ſeverity, which their ſufferings, and the public ſafety, ſo juſtly call for. Under this concern my greateſt comfort is, that I cannot reproach myſelf with having given the leaſt provocation to that ſpirit of diſcontent and calumny that has been let looſe againſt me, or the leaſt pretence for kindling the flame of this rebellion.

"Let thoſe whoſe fatal counſels laid the foundation of all theſe miſchiefs, and thoſe whoſe private diſcontents and diſappointments, diſguiſed under falſe pretences, have betrayed great numbers of deluded people into their own deſtruction, anſwer for the miſeries in which they have involved their fellow ſubjects. I queſtion not, but that, with the continuance of God's bleſſing, who alone is able to form good out of evil, and with the chearful aſſiſtance of my parliament, we ſhall in a ſhort time ſee the rebellion end, not only in reſtoring the tranquillity of my government, but in procuring a firm and laſting eſtabliſhment of that excellent conſtitution both in church and ſtate, which it was manifeſtly deſigned to ſubvert; and that this open and flagrant attempt, in favour of popery, will aboliſh all other diſtinctions among us, but of ſuch as are zealous aſſertors of the liberties of this country, the preſent eſtabliſhment, and the proteſtant religion, and of ſuch as are endeavouring to ſubject the nation to the revenge and tyranny of a popiſh pretender."

To this ſpeech both lords and commons returned a dutiful addreſs, and the commons declared, that they thought themſelves obliged, in juſtice to their injured country, to proſecute, in the moſt rigorous manner, the authors of thoſe deſtructive counſels, which had drawn down thoſe miſeries upon the nation. Accordingly they expelled Mr. Forſter, general of the Northumbrian rebels, and impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithſdale, Wintoun and Carnwarth, and the lords Widdrington, Kenmure, and Nairn, of high-treaſon. They likewiſe brought in a bill of attainder againſt the earl of Mar, William Murray, ſtiled the marquis of Tullibardine, the earl of Linlithgow, and John lord Drummond. All theſe noblemen, the earl of Wintoun only excepted, pleaded guilty to their indictments, and Wintoun was afterwards found guilty.

Great intereſt was made to ſave the lives of theſe noblemen but without effect. Their unhappy wives begged with tears the interceſſion of parliament. The houſe of lords preſented an addreſs, praying his majeſty to reprieve ſuch of the condemned lords as ſhould deſerve his clemency. The king was, however, inflexible; he anſwered very coldly that he would do what he thought moſt conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown and the ſecurity of his ſubjects. The earl of Derwentwater and Kenmure were beheaded on Tower-hill on the twenty-fourth of February. The earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn were reprieved. The earl of Nithſdale was to have ſuffered with Derwentwater and Kenmure; but his mother ſaved him by a generous artifice: ſhe obtained permiſſion to take her laſt leave of him, ran to embrace him in priſon, and they inſtantly changed dreſſes. By this means he eſcaped, and ſhe continued in priſon. On being interrogated at the bar of the houſe of lords concerning the place of the earl's retreat, ſhe obſerved a profound ſilence. At laſt, in juſtice to her generous affection and virtues, ſhe was diſcharged. Wintoun alſo afterwards made his eſcape, as did Forſter and Mackintoſh out of Newgate. Twenty-two of the rebels were hanged in the country, and ſeveral at Tyburn; particularly colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Paul a clergyman, and Mr. Hall a juſtice of peace.

This rigour excerciſed againſt the delinquents rendered the miniſtry odious to all who had any ſenſe of humanity. The court was alarmed, and it was determined to take the moſt proper meaſures for preventing the effect. The preſent parliament was at the devotion of a miniſtry; but it was greatly feared a new one might not be ſo; they might poſſibly return upon the miniſtry the rigour they had excerciſed upon the people. The act of triennial parliaments, that bulwark of the national liberty, was juſtly alarming to a miniſtry, evidently inclined to deſpotiſm. It was indeed dangerous to attack a law of this importance, but the juncture was extremely favourable. It was therefore determined to repeal this act, though juſtly conſidered as the principal defence of the people againſt the attempts of arbitrary power. A motion was accordingly made in the houſe of peers for effecting this purpoſe. It was ſaid, that too frequent elections kept up the ſpirit and activity of parties, fomented family diſcords, brought on ruinous expences, and gave occaſion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign powers; that in the preſent ſtate of affairs it was neceſſary to remedy the evil; and that there was no better method of extinguiſhing the flames of rebellion, which were always ready to break out anew, than by bringing in a bill for extending the duration of parliaments. Theſe arguments were ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by ſeveral of the peers. "The fundamental laws of the kingdom;" they ſaid "required frequent parliaments. They were eſtabliſhed by the cuſtom of many ages; they were particularly intereſting to the liberty and glory of the ſubject. What confidence could foreigners repoſe in a nation that would idly ſacrifice its moſt precious rights? The expence of elections, the cabals they might occaſion would be ſo far from weakening the new and dangerous ſyſtem, that they would promote it by the intereſt individuals would have in procuring ſeats in a long parliament. The miniſtry would find ſtronger means and motives to corrupt the members. And might not the ſame parliament, that had effected its prolongation, effect alſo its perpetuity, which alone was wanting to deſtroy the privileges of the people, and the conſtitution itſelf." Theſe arguments however national, however forcible, were too weak to operate againſt the influence of the court. Diſputes and animoſities took place, but the two houſes paſſed the bill, which extended the duration of parliaments to ſeven years. Thus the king triumphed over a people, whoſe affection it was doubtleſs his intereſt to ſollicit.

The obedience of parliament, however, ſupplied, in ſome meaſure that affection; and his affairs calling him into Germany, the parliament annulled the clauſe in the act of limitation which prevented his going out of the kingdom. A period was accordingly put to the ſeſſion of parliament, and the king paſſed over to the continent on the ſeventh of July.

The king had acquired the dutchies of Bremen and Verden, of which Charles XII. of Sweden had been ſtripped by his enemies. That young hero, with all the perſonal valour, and virtues much ſuperior to thoſe of Alexander, but like him borne away with a paſſion for war, that ſin againſt humanity, having eſcaped from his captivity at Bender, breathed nothing but vengeance, and was impatient to repair his misfortunes. Incenſed againſt the king of Great-Britain, he was reſolved if poſſible to ruin him; and accordingly undertook to head an invaſion in favour of the pretender. He who had placed Staniſlaus on the throne of Poland, might hope to reſtore the Stuarts to their hereditary right in England. His ambaſſadors at London and the Hague ſecretly conſpired in this deſign. The meaſures were artfully taken; and the dangers that attended the execution ſeemed to leſſen. A multitude of the malecontents were deſirous of joining the ſtandards of ſo great a general, and the mobs in London, roſe to the higheſt pitch of outrage.

Informed of the deſign formed by the Swediſh monarch, the king ſuddenly quitted Hanover, and returned to London. He had ſtrengthed himſelf by an alliance with the ſtates-general, but this would not have been ſufficient to remove the danger had the ſecret remained impenetrable. On the king's arrival the Swediſh ambaſſador, count Gyllenbourg, was put under arreſt; and baron Gortz, the Swediſh reſident at the Hague, was alſo confined. The plan of this intended invaſion was this; a number of veſſels had been purchaſed, and were to repair under various pretences to Gottenburgh in Sweden, about the latter end of March, the ſeaſon when the eaſterly winds, which are fair for bringing ſhips from the Baltic to England, generally prevail. Eight thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, all picked men, together with a formidable train of artillery, a large quantity of amunition and proviſions, and arms ſufficient for twenty thouſand men, were to have been embarked on board theſe ſhips. The confederates were ſo ſure of being joined by the diſcontented party in England, that the deſign had been intruſted to a very few perſons only; nor was there any formal treaty drawn up between the parties engaged in this affair; the mutual intereſt each had in the ſucceſs was thought more binding than the moſt ſolemn engagements.

In the mean time the arreſting the Swediſh ambaſſador, and ſeizing his papers by which the whole plot was diſcovered, alarmed the other foreign miniſters reſiding at the court of London. They complained to the miniſtry of this outrage committed againſt the law of nations. The two ſecretaries of ſtate wrote circular letters to theſe reſidents, aſſuring them that in a few days they ſhould be made acquainted with the reaſons for this extraordinary proceeding. All, except the marquis de Monteleone ambaſſador from Spain, were ſatisfied with this intimation. He replied, that he was extremely ſorry no other way could be found to preſerve the peace of the kingdom, than that of arreſting the perſon of a public miniſter, and ſeizing his papers, the ſacred repoſitories of his maſter's ſecrets; and that in whatever light thoſe two facts might ſeem to be underſtood, they very ſenſibly wounded the law of nations. This, however, was far from being true: the Engliſh monarch acted conſiſtently with the ſtricteſt principles of juſtice in impriſoning his enemy. Gyllenbourg had violated the law of nations by conſpiring againſt the prince to whom he was ſent in a public character; and therefore the Engliſh had an undoubted right to diſpenſe with the obſervance of the ſame law, by arreſting his perſon.

A. D. 1717. The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of February, and the ſeſſion opened with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I was in hopes that the ſucceſs which it has pleaſed God to give us, in defeating the late rebellion, might have ſecured to this nation, peace, plenty and tranquillity.

"My endeavours have not been wanting, during your receſs, to improve the happy proſpect which was in view, by entering into ſuch negotiations, as I judged moſt conducive to thoſe good ends: and it is with pleaſure I can acquaint you, that many defects in the treaty of Utrecht, which very nearly affected the trade, and even the ſecurity of theſe kingdoms, have been remedied by ſubſequent conventions, the happy conſequences of which have already very ſenſibly appeared, by the flouriſhing condition of our trade and credit.

"By the alliance lately concluded with France and the ſtates-general, we are ſoon to be eaſed of all future apprehenſions from Dunkirk and Mardyke. The pretender is actually removed beyond the Alps: His adherents are deprived of all hopes of ſupport and countenance from France; and even the aſſiſtance of that crown is ſtipulated to us in caſe of exigence.

"It ſeemed reaſonable to expect, that ſuch a ſituation of affairs at home and abroad, would have recovered from their deluſion all ſuch of our ſubjects, as had unhappily been ſeduced by the craft and wickedneſs of deſperate and ill-deſigning men, and thereby have afforded me the opportunity, which I deſired, of following the natural bent of my own inclinations to lenity, by opening this ſeſſion with an act of grace. But ſuch is the obſtinate and inveterate rancour of a faction amongſt us, that it hath again prompted them to animate and ſtir up foreign powers to diſturb the peace of their own native country: they will chuſe rather to make Britain a ſcene of blood and confuſion, and to venture even the putting this kingdom under a foreign yoke, than give over their darling deſign of impoſing a popiſh pretender.

"I have ordered to be laid before you copies of letters, which have paſſed between the Swediſh miniſters on this occaſion, which contain a certain account of the projected invaſion: And I promiſe myſelf from your experienced zeal and affection to my perſon and government, that you will come to ſuch reſolutions, as will enable me, by the bleſſing of God, to defeat all the deſigns of our enemies againſt us.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I did hope, the putting an end to the late rebellion, would have ſo far ſecured the peace and tranquillity of the nation, that I might, conſiſtently with the ſafety of my people, have made a conſiderable reduction of the forces. But the preparations that are making abroad to invade us, oblige me to aſk ſuch ſupplies, as you ſhall find abſolntely neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom.

"You are all ſenſible of the inſupportable weight of the national debts, which the public became engaged for from the neceſſity of the times, the preſſures of a long and expenſive war, and the languiſhing ſtate of public credit. But the ſcene being now ſo happily changed, if no new diſturbances ſhall plunge us again into ſtreights and difficulties, the general expectation ſeems to require of you, that you ſhould turn your thoughts towards ſome method of extricating yourſelves, by reducing, by degrees, the debts of the nation.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have an entire confidence in you, and have therefore nothing to aſk, but, that you would take ſuch meaſures, as will beſt ſecure your religion and liberties. While you preſerve thoſe ineſtimable bleſſings, I ſhall ſit eaſy and ſafe on my throne, having no other view but the happineſs and proſperity of my people."

The letters of the Swediſh miniſters being read in both houſes, very loyal addreſſes were voted to his majeſty. But when the ſupply came under conſideration, ſeveral members declared againſt it, inſiſting that it was contrary to the cuſtom of parliament; that new alliances ought not to be purchaſed with money. After long and violent debates the ſupply was granted, though only by a ſmall majority. And thus Great Britain found herſelf engaged in continental connections, becauſe the reigning family poſſeſſed eſtates in Germany; an inconvenience which has more than once been felt, and which always muſt be felt whilſt a ſtanding army ſhall be thought neceſſary to the prince as it is uneaſy to the people.

The carrying this vote by ſo ſmall a majority alarmed the king, and a change in the miniſtry was thought neceſſary. Accordingly Sir Robert Walpole, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Pulteney, ſecretary at war; Mr. Methuen, ſecretary of ſtate; the duke of Devonſhire, preſident of the council; and ſeveral others, reſigned their employments; ſo that the miniſtry underwent an almoſt total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addiſon were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; Mr. Stanhope, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Craggs ſecretary at war; the earl of Berkely firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; the duke of Bolton lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and the duke of Newcaſtle lord-chamberlain.

The earl of Oxford, who had languiſhed about two years in the Tower, availed himſelf of this quarrel in the miniſtry, to demand his trial. The moſt violent diſputes happened between the two houſes concerning the manner of the proceſs. The lords inſiſted that the commons ſhould firſt proceed to make good the articles of high treaſon againſt the earl, before they attempted to prove thoſe relating only to high crimes and miſdemeanors. The commons refuſed to proceed only as they ſtood in the impeachment. The breach became wider between the two houſes, and the lords refuſed a conference which had been demanded by the commons. The accuſers were now ordered to appear and make good their charge againſt the earl of Oxford; they refuſed, and the noble priſoner was ſet at liberty. The lower houſe were ſo exaſperated at this proceeding, that they excepted the earl, together with Mr. Prior and ſome others, from the act of grace which the king had, at length, granted. This act did not, however, efface the impreſſions the ſeverity preceding it had occaſioned. A prudent clemency knows how to forgive with propriety, and how to induce repentance. George was accuſed of not imitating his predeceſſors in this particular.

Great preparations were made for oppoſing the deſcent meditated by the Swediſh monarch, but an unforeſeen event rendered them unneceſſary. Charles XII. who was on the point of concluding an alliance with the czar of Muſcovy, was ſlain at the ſiege of Frederickſhal in Norway; and all that he had taken remained in the hands of the poſſeſſors. George had not yet received the inveſtiture of the dutchies of Bremen and Verden, for which reaſon he thought proper to ſupport the emperor Charles VI. againſt Spain. Whilſt Charles, as an ally of the Venetians, was carrying on a war againſt the Turks, a war famous for the victories of prince Eugene; Philip V. under ſome ſpecious pretence, made himſelf maſter of part of Sardinia. Cardinal Alberoni his miniſter, a man of unbounded ambition, expoſed the throne of Spain to dangers which a more prudent miniſter might have avoided. The emperor, France, England, and Holland, concluded the famous treaty, called the Quadruple Alliance, for the tranquillity of Europe. This treaty regulated the diviſion of certain demeſnes. Philip was diſſatisfied, and preparations were made for a war. The parliament fixed the number of troops to ſixteen thouſand men, and paſſed a bill to puniſh mutiny and deſertion. An act ſo contrary to the genius of the Engliſh, ſufficiently diſplays what extraordinary alteration of principles had taken place; though the œconomy of military diſcipline might poſſibly be beſt conſulted by this meaſure.

A. D. 1718. The purpoſe of the quadruple alliance was to oblige the king of Spain to make peace with the emperor, to whom the duke of Savoy was to give up Sicily in exchange for Sardinia. This treaty, too advantageous to the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe power it augmented in Italy, was rejected by the court of Spain; and the king of England prepared to ſupport his mediation by force of arms. Sir George Byng was ſent into the Mediterranean with twenty-one ſail of the line. The Spaniſh ſquadron, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven ſail, was diſcovered on the ninth of Auguſt, in the Faro of Meſſina. On ſight of the Engliſh ſquadron they ſtood away, but ſtill in order of battle. On the eleventh ſix of the Spaniſh men of war, with all the gallies, fire-ſhips, bomb-veſſels and ſtore-ſhips, ſeparated from the main fleet, and ſtood in for the Sicilian ſhore; upon which Sir George Byng detached captain Walton, with ſix ſhips of the line, in purſuit of them. The admiral himſelf continued to chaſe the main fleet, and about ten o'clock the battle began. The Spaniards made but a poor defence, and were ſoon totally defeated, and all taken, except three ſhips of the line and three frigates, which eſcaped to Malta.

The Spaniards exclaimed againſt this conduct of the admiral, as a breach of the law of nature. Several members of both houſes of parliament, and Mr. Walpole in particular, blamed it with great aſperity. Complaint was alſo made of the injury done to commerce by this irregular and precipitate rupture; but theſe complaints had little effect. The parliament, where the intereſt of the court prevailed, approved of all that had been done, and war was declared againſt Spain.

About this time the duke of Orleans, regent of France, diſcovered a plot formed by cardinal Alberoni againſt his perſon. That intriguing and audacious miniſter propoſed nothing leſs than overturning the whole French government. This diſcovery produced a declaration of war. France, who had laviſhed her blood and her treaſures in ſupporting Philip V. now turned his enemy. So eaſily are the ties of nature broken by political motives. Alberoni, always rendered impatient by oppoſition, projected an invaſion of England in favour of the pretender. He cauſed him to paſs into Italy, and projected methods for landing him in Scotland, where he flattered himſelf the diſcontented party would join him.

A. D. 1719. The deſigns of Alberoni were not long a ſecret in England, and the moſt proper meaſures were taken to render it abortive. The king came to the houſe of peers, and informed both houſes of parliament of the deſigns of the Spaniards, and received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of ſupport. The commons deſired him to augment his forces by ſea and land, in ſuch a manner as he ſhould think proper, promiſing to make good any increaſe of expence that might be incurred on that account.

In the mean time the fleet that had been for ſome time fitting out at Cadiz, conſiſting of ten men of war, and a conſiderable number of tranſports, on board of which were ſix thouſand regular troops, and arms for ten or twelve thouſand, put to ſea. The duke of Ormond, who was impatient to revenge his diſgrace, was appointed the chief conductor of this undertaking, with the title of captain-general of the king of Spain: he was ordered to publiſh, in proper places, a declaration in that king's name, wherein he ſaid, that for many very good reaſons, he was reſolved to ſend part of his land and ſea forces into England and Scotland, to ſerve as auxiliaries to king James. What had confirmed him in this reſolution was the certain advices he had received, that great numbers of perſons in the two nations, notwithſtanding their ſtrong inclination to acknowledge that prince for their ſovereign, durſt not openly declare for him, becauſe they did not ſee him ſupported by any of the ſtates of Europe, who were either powerful or willing to aſſiſt them: that to remove this and other difficulties that might ariſe, he declared he was determined to uſe all his power for the reſtoration of a prince, in a country belonging to him by undeniable right: that he hoped providence would favour ſo juſt a cauſe; but that the fear of ill ſucceſs might not hinder any perſon from declaring readily for him, he promiſed a ſecure retreat in his dominions to all that ſhould join him, and, in caſe they were forced to leave their country, he declared that every ſea or land officer ſhould have the ſame rank as he enjoyed in Great Britain, and the ſoldiers be received and treated as his own.

But the duke never had an opportunity of publiſhing this declaration. The ſquadron was overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm off Cape Finiſterre, and laſted two days and two nights, whereby the fleet was entirely diſperſed, and diſabled from purſuing their voyage. The admiral's ſhip of ſixty-four guns, having loſt all her maſts, made for the coaſt of Spain; and the reſt did the ſame, and with great difficulty reached their own harbours. Two frigates, however, which ſailed from Port-Paſſage, reached Kintail in Scotland, and landed their forces, conſiſting of three hundred men, together with the earls of Seaforth and Mariſchal, and the marquis of Tullibardine. They joined the rebel army, conſiſting of about two thouſand one hundred highlanders. But they were ſoon after defeated by general Wightmen, and the Spaniards ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The chief of the rebels, Seaforth, Tullibardine, Mariſchal, and ſame others, eſcaped to Lewis or the Orkney iſlands.

Soon after the emperor's general, ſupported by admiral Byng, ſubdued part of Sicily. Lord Cobham, aſſiſted with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips commanded by captain Meghels, took Vigo, and Ponta Vedra, and deſtroyed the ſhips in the harbour. The king of Spain, unable to reſiſt ſo many enemies, acceded to the quadruple alliance, and diſmiſſed Alberoni, whoſe ambitious projects had involved him in this war.

But before theſe events happened, the king came, on the eighteenth of April, to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am now come to put an end to this ſeſſion, in which you have ſhewn many great and ſeaſonable proofs of your duty and affection to my perſon and government, and of your care for the ſafety and welfare of your fellow ſubjects,

"By the bleſſing of God and our own endeavours we have hitherto diſappointed the deſigns of our enemies, who flattered themſelves with ſucceſs from our unhappy diviſions.

"We perceive, by the raſh and deſperate counſels which have lately prevailed in the court of Spain, and the deſperate and extravagant projects of one ambitious man, though not capable of giving fears to their neighbours, may occaſion to them ſome expence and trouble.

"That court, being influenced by counſels odious and deſtructive to the Spaniards, who find themſelves neglected and oppreſſed, after having endeavoured to foment conſpiracies and ſeditions, both here and in France, and ſtooped to practices unuſual, accompanied by maniſeſtoes of a ſtile unheard of among great princes, at laſt proceeded to acknowledge the pretender.

"As this news has given great ſurprize to all Europe, I queſtion not but it will be received by every good Briton with indignation and contempt.

"It is our happineſs, at this juncture, to find ourſelves aſſiſted by the greateſt powers in Europe, againſt an enemy, that has no allies, but thoſe who would betray the government under which they live and are protected.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I thank you very heartily for the ſupplies you have granted me this year. The manner in which you have raiſed them, without any new burden to my people, the great addition you have made to the fund for ſinking the debts of the nation, the diſcharge of the exchequer bills, and the proviſions you have made to pay whatſoever remains juſtly due to foreign ſtates and princes, are the ſtrongeſt proofs of your wiſdom, as well as your zeal for my ſervice, and the good of your country. You may obſerve I have hitherto been very cautious of making uſe of the power you have given me to increaſe our forces by ſea and land. If your enemies ſhould oblige me to a greater expence, it ſhall be employed for your ſervice. This is what the truſt you repoſed in me requires at my hands, and what I owe to ſo dutiful and affectionate a houſe of commons.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"There being nothing more deſirable at all times than a firm union among proteſtants, I reflect with ſatisfaction on a law you have paſſed this ſeſſions, which will, I hope, prove effectual to that purpoſe. As it is a ſignal inſtance of moderation and indulgence in our eſtabliſhed church, ſo I hope it will beget ſuch a return of gratitude from all diſſenting proteſtants, and will greatly tend to our honour and ſecurity, both which I ſhall ever have near at heart.

"I have alſo looked upon the glory of a ſovereign and the liberty of a ſubject as inſeparable; and think it is the peculiar happineſs of a Britiſh king to reign over a free people. As the civil rights, therefore, and privileges of all my ſubjects, and eſpecially of my two houſes of parliament, do juſtly claim my moſt tendern concern, if any proviſion deſigned to perpetuate theſe bleſſings to your poſterity remains imperfect, for want of time, during this ſeſſion, maturely to diſcuſs and ſettle matters of ſo great importance, I promiſe myſelf you will take the firſt opportunity to render my wiſhes for your happineſs complete and effectual, and to ſtrengthen the union which is of ſo much conſequence to the welfare of this kingdom.

"If the circumſtances of my affairs ſhall allow of my going abroad this ſummer, I ſhall take the ſame care of your intereſts as if I remained here. The many negotiations which will be on foot, to reſtore the peace of the North, in which the trade and tranquillity of this kingdom may be very much concerned, will make my preſence there of great uſe to theſe my dominions. And as, in that caſe, I deſign, by the bleſſing of God, to meet you early next winter, I will only recommend to you moſt earneſtly, that, laying aſide all animoſities, you would, in your ſeveral counties and ſtations, uſe your utmoſt endeavours to preſerve the public peace, and ſee a due execution of the laws."

A. D. 1720. We are now come to a period which will always be remarkable in Engliſh hiſtory for the deſtructive South-ſea ſcheme, when the inſatiable hand of avarice threw the whole kingdom into confuſion. At the opening the ſeſſion of parliament, his majeſty had earneſtly recommended the conſideration of proper means for reducing the national debt, which amounted to more than fourteen millions. A ſcheme was accordingly formed for reducing all the public funds into one, in order to diſcharge the whole. This plan was laid by Sir John Blount, one of the directors of the South-ſea company, a perſon poſſeſſed of all the art, plauſibility and boldneſs requiſite in ſuch an undertaking. This ſcheme he communicated to Mr. Aiſlebie, chancellor of the exchequer, and alſo to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. It was conſidered by the miniſtry; and appearing to be very advantageous to the public, it was adopted.

It now remained to carry the plan into execution; and the South-ſea company laid a propoſal before the houſe of commons, offering to give three millions five hundred thouſand pounds for the privilege of taking in all the irredeemable debts, amounting to near eight hundred thouſand pounds per annum; and alſo the redeemable debts then at the bank and exchequer, moſtly bearing five per cent. intereſt, either by purchaſe from the proprietors, or by ſubſcriptions into their capital ſtock. This method of increaſing their capital was looked upon as a very valuable acquiſition, and excited the jealouſy of the directors of the bank of England, and accordingly the directors of that opulent body laid their propoſal before the commons. They offered to give above five millions for the ſame privilege. This rivalſhip proved the deſtruction of the whole. The South-ſea company made a ſecond propoſal: they offered no leſs than ſeven millions and a half, in caſe theſe debts ſhould be ſubſcribed, and in proportion for any part of them. They alſo propoſed to pay to the uſe of the public one year's purchaſe of all the irredeemable long annuities that ſhould be brought into their capital. The bank now made a ſecond propoſal, more advantageous, in ſeveral reſpects, to the public, than that of the South-ſea company. They obliged themſelves to give ſeventeen hundred pounds bank-ſtock for every hundred pounds irredeemable long annuities. But this offer was far from intimidating the South-ſea company. Determined, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, they offered to incorporate all the funds of the bank, Eaſt-India company and exchequer, into their own capital. It was not, indeed, thought proper to adopt this propoſal, but the very rumour of ſuch a ſcheme raiſed their ſtock to one hundred and twenty per cent. They now offered five hundred thouſand pounds more than the bank, and alſo four years and a half purchaſe upon all annuities they ſhould take into their capital; which, if all the annuities were taken in, the whole would amount to three millions, five hundred and ſixty-ſeven thouſand, five hundred and three pounds; ſo that their whole offer was ſeven millions, five hundred ſixty-ſeven thouſand five hundred pounds. Beſides this, they not only offered to circulate one million of exchequer-bills gratis, but to pay three per cent. for that million, and one year's purchaſe of ſuch annuities as ſhould be ſubſcribed into the company's capital in fourteen months.

This propoſal was adopted, and a bill was ordered to be brought into the houſe of commons for that purpoſe. While the bill was under conſideration, the company's ſtock roſe to near four hundred per cent. The bill paſſed both houſes, but not without great oppoſition in the houſe of lords, and received the royal aſſent. The king paſſed over to his German dominions, and every thing ſeemed to promiſe domeſtic tranquillity. But the reſtleſs paſſion of avarice ſoon obliterated theſe pleaſing appearances, and threw the nation into the utmoſt diſtreſs.

The South-ſea company finding their ſtock began to ſink in its value, cauſed a notion to be propagated, that Gibraltar and Portmahon would be given up to the Spaniards, in exchange for a large diſtrict in Peru, where the Engliſh trade to the South-ſea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffuſed with great induſtry, inſpired the people with ſuch extravagant hopes, that two millions of original ſtock were ſubſcribed in leſs than five days after the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament. The ſtock of the company roſe to above a thouſand per cent. The Miſſiſippi ſcheme in France, which had juſt turned that kingdom upſide down, was better founded. But the paſſion for riches, like other paſſions, is ſometimes too blind to be directed by experience, and too deaf to liſten to the voice of reaſon. The deſire of acquiring large fortunes drew into the ſnare a multitude of unhappy people, who became the dupes of intereſted artifice. The rage of ſtock-jobbing filled every head, and ſwallowed up every other idea. Whigs, tories, jacobites, the nobility, the clergy, phyſicians, lawyers, merchants, and the very women themſelves, were all animated with the ſame ſpirit: all converted their money into paper; all believed they ſhould grow rich by parting with their riches. But this charm was of no long duration. It was ſoon found, that the South-ſea commerce, the ruinous foundation of theſe enormous proceedings, was far from being ſufficient to anſwer the views of avarice. Stocks therefore fell prodigiouſly; and ſeveral projects, ſet on foot by the fraudulent induſtry of covetouſneſs, were totally rejected. No money appeared; payment of the dividends was ſtopped, and public credit vaniſhed. Families, without number, were reduced to beggary; and the intoxication of frivolous and ſenſeleſs hope was ſucceeded by the cries of deſpair.

Recourſe was now had to the bank for ſupporting the South-ſea company. That corporation entered into an agreement to take a quantity of the South-ſea ſtock at four hundred per cent. in payment for three millions ſeven hundred and ſeventy-five thouſand pounds, redeemable debt, which the company was to repay at Lady-day and Michaelmas of the enſuing year. This was afterwards called the Bank-contract, the very rumour of which cauſed the South-ſea ſtock to riſe prodigiouſly. But this riſe did not continue long. It ſoon appeared that this ſuppoſed contract had no real foundation, being nothing more than a temporary expedient, to quiet the clamours of the people. The directors of the bank, finding their property to be in danger of being ſwept away by that portentous tide of ruin, which bore down every thing before it, renounced their agreement; and the South-ſea company, deprived of this ſupport, ſunk under its own weight.

The king, who had been in Hanover ſince the beginning of the ſummer, haſtened to England, to remedy a diſorder that threatened the deſtruction of the whole nation. In this alarming criſis, the king opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the eighth of December, with the following ſpeech from the throne.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ Since we laſt parted, the face of our affairs abroad is become more favourable. The peace in the ſouth wants only the form of a congreſs; and that of the north is brought much nearer to a concluſion. I ſhall, at a proper time, order the ſeveral treaties I have made to be laid before you; by which you will perceive the ſucceſs of our endeavours to eſtabliſh peace throughout Europe, and to ſecure and ſupport the proteſtant religion. At the ſame time, I can never ſufficiently expreſs my concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which has ſo much affected the public credit at home.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ I do moſt earneſtly recommend it to you, that you conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore the national credit, and fix it upon a laſting foundation. You will, I doubt not, be aſſiſted in ſo commendable and neceſſary a work, by every man that loves his country, and eſpecially by the ſeveral great ſocieties of this kingdom. I hope you will, on this occaſion, remember, that all your prudence, your temper and reſolution, are neceſſary to find out and apply the proper remedies to our misfortunes; which will, if you ſucceed, ſerve to increaſe that reputation you have ſo juſtly acquired; particularly, if you ſhall be able, notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, to diſcharge a part of the national debt. I have ordered the ſeveral eſtimates to be laid before you of the expence of the enſuing year, and deſire you to diſpatch the ſupplies neceſſary for them.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I am glad to obſerve to you, that our trade appears to have been more extended this year than in the preceding. We have the moſt flouriſhing navy of any nation whatſoever to protect us; and I hope you will turn your thoughts to the beſt methods for the ſecuring and enlarging of our commerce. You may depend upon my hearty concurrence to all ſuch proviſions as ſhall appear to you neceſſary for the good of my people.”

The two houſes ſhewed the greateſt zeal to effect that neceſſary particular, the re-eſtabliſhment of the public credit. All the members of the commons, who had been concerned in theſe iniquitous proceedings, were expelled the houſe. Knight, caſhier to the South-ſea company, perceived the ſtorm, and paſſed over to the continent, to prevent its effects. All the reſt were determined to ſtand the ſhock of national reſentment, which was now raiſed to an enormous height. The commons ſeemed to have laid aſide all party diſtinctions, and to vie with each other in promoting an enquiry of ſo much importance to their country. Favour was diſregarded by all; the guilty were examined; the eſtates of the directors were confiſcated, except a bare ſubſiſtence; the creditors were indemnified as far as circumſtances would permit; and public credit, the deſtruction of which muſt have ruined the nation, was reſtored. The parliament could not poſſibly have done a greater favour to the nation. Sir Robert Walpole contributed largely, by his genius and application, to the ſucceſs of this perplexed affair. Upon this he was reſtored to favour, and made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury and chancellor of the exchequer.

A. D. 1721. Among the many diſputes that had been agitated in the parliament, ſome eccleſiaſtical matters had a conſiderable ſhare. In 1718, a bill had paſſed for annulling the ſevere acts againſt the non-conformiſts. Dr. Hoadly, biſhop of Bangor, aſſerted, that ſuch bills were laws for perſecution; and that if bills of intolerance were admitted in eccleſiaſtical matters, all perſecutions of infidels, of heathens, and even the popiſh inquiſition, might be juſtified. In the mean time, the increaſe of impiety and licentiouſneſs awakened the zeal of thoſe who were of more rigid ſentiments. Unbounded luxury, unbridled debauchery, and an affected contempt of religion and morality, were the effects of a ſyſtem which had made gold and ſilver the objects of human worſhip. Atheiſm walked abroad, without a maſk, in open day. The Deity himſelf was deſpiſed, or not acknowledged; and no reſtraint, no principle, no rule, remained. One of the peers delivered a very pathetic ſpeech on this ſubject; in conſequence of which, a bill was brought in againſt blaſphemy and profaneneſs, in which were ſeveral clauſes not perfectly conſiſtent with the liberty of conſcience previouſly granted to the non-conformiſts. Theſe clauſes occaſioned a ſtrong oppoſition to the bill. Diſputes grew warm, and gave occaſion to ſome very ſingular propoſitions. One of the biſhops having repreſented the evil conſequences of the reigning vices, lord Onſlow anſwered with deriſion, that the prelate muſt have been himſelf a great ſinner, ſince he had loſt large ſums in the South-ſea. The duke of Wharton, famous for his licentiouſneſs, declared that he was neither a friend to blaſphemy, nor an enemy to religion; but, at the ſame time, could not approve the bill, becauſe he thought it contrary to ſcripture; and taking a bible out of his pocket, he read ſeveral paſſages, and thence concluded that the bill ought to be rejected. The opinion of the earl of Peterborough was ſtill more ſingular: he declared, that he was very willing to have a parliament king, but neither a parliament God nor a parliament religion; and that if the bill laid any reſtraint on him, on this account, he would go to Rome, and canvaſs for a cardinal's hat; for he thought it much better to treat of ſuch matters in the conclave than in the houſe of peers. The ſupporters of the bill finding an oppoſition they did not expect, moved that it ſhould be poſtponed. This was agreed to, and the whole was dropped.

It was very late before the ſupplies were granted, and even then not with the uſual chearfulneſs and alacrity. All difficulties were, however, at laſt ſurmounted, and the king obtained ſufficient ſupplies to ſatisfy his engagements with Sweden; engagements that had very little relation to the Engliſh. His majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion on the tenth of Auguſt; when he declared in his ſpeech, that he entertained a moſt ſincere concern for the ſufferings of the innocent, and a juſt indignation againſt the guilty, relative to the South-ſea ſcheme: that he had readily given his aſſent to ſuch bills as had been preſented to him for puniſhing the authors of the late miſfortunes, and for obtaining reſtitution and ſatisfaction to thoſe who had been injured by them in ſo notorious a manner: that they could not fail to have obſerved the diſcontents occaſioned by this unhappy event, which had been induſtriouſly fomented by wicked and ſeditious libels; but he doubted not but by their prudent conduct in their ſeveral counties, all the enemies of his government, who flattered themſelves with being able to blow up the preſent complaints into popular diſaffection, would be finally diſappointed in their deſigns and expectations.

A dreadful plague having for ſome time raged at Marſeilles, a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding any perſon to come into England from any part of France, between the Bay of Biſcay and Dunkirk, without certificates of health. Lazarettos were ordered to be built, and lines to be drawn round where the contagion had penetrated. On this occaſion it was repreſented, that to ſhut up the people in hoſpitals, by order of government, and to draw lines round the places infected, were practices inconſiſtent with the conſtitution of England, incompatible with the mildneſs of a free government, and more particularly odious, as they imitated, in this reſpect, the government of France. Theſe arguments, though ſtrongly refuted, procured a repeal of the act of parliament that had given offence. The idea of conſtitutional liberty prevailed over public ſecurity.

A. D. 1722. The parliament having finiſhed all the buſineſs before them by the month of March, they were diſſolved, and another ordered to be choſen. Soon after the diſſolution of parliament, the great duke of Marlborough paid the debt of nature. His faculties had been for ſome time greatly impaired; he was no longer capable of ſhining either in the ſenate or the field. He was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance and colonel of the firſt regiment of foot guards, by the earl of Cadogan.

The election was ſo well managed, that moſt of the members of the former were returned for the new one, which met on the nineteenth of October, and the ſeſſion was opened with the following ſpeech from the throne:

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I acquainted you when we parted laſt, of our having renewed all our treaties of commerce with Spain; ſince which peace is happily reſtored in the north, by the concluſion of a treaty between the czar and the king of Sweden, and by that which I have made with the Moors, a great number of my ſubjects are delivered from ſlavery; and all of them who trade to thoſe parts of the world, are, for the future, ſecured from falling under that dreadful calamity.

“ In this ſituation of affairs we ſhould be extremely wanting to ourſelves, if we neglected to improve the favourable opportunity, which this general tranquillity gives us, of extending our commerce, upon which the riches and grandeur of this nation chiefly depend. It is very obvious that nothing would more conduce to the obtaining ſo public a good, than to make the exportation of our own manufactures, and the importation of the commodities uſed in the manufacturing of them, as practical and eaſy as poſſible. By this means the balance of trade may be preſerved in our favour, our navigation increaſed, and greater numbers of our poor employed.

“ I muſt therefore recommend it to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to conſider how far the duties upon theſe branches may be taken off and replaced, without any violence of public faith, or laying any new burden upon my people. And I promiſe myſelf, that by a due conſideration of this matter, the produce of thoſe duties, compared with the infinite advantage that will accrue to the kingdom by their being taken off, will be found ſo inconſiderable, as to leave little room for any difficulties or objections.

“ The ſupplying ourſelves with naval ſtores, upon terms the moſt eaſy and leaſt precarious, ſeems highly to deſerve the ear and attention of parliament. Our plantations in America naturally abound with moſt of the proper materials for this neceſſary and eſſential part of our trade and maritime ſtrength: and if, by a due encouragement, we could be furniſhed from them with thoſe naval ſtores, which we are now obliged to purchaſe and bring from foreign countries, it would not only greatly contribute to the riches, influence, and power of this nation, but by employing our own colonies in this uſeful and advantageous ſervice, divert them from ſetting up and carrying on manufactures, which directly interfere with thoſe of Great Britain.

“ Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

“ It will be a great pleaſure to me, if, in raiſing the ſupplies of this year, it may be ſo ordered, that my people may reap ſome immediate benefit from the preſent circumſtances of affairs abroad. I have ordered the eſtimates to be prepared for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and alſo an account of the debts of the navy to be laid before you. You muſt be ſenſible of the ill conſequences that ariſe from ſuch a large debt remaining unprovided for; and that as long as the navy and victualling bills are at a very large diſcount, they do not only affect all other public credit, but greatly increaſe the charge and expence of the current ſervice. It is therefore very much to be wiſhed, that you could find a method of diſcharging this part of the national debt, being of all other the moſt heavy and burdenſome; and by that means have it in your power to eaſe your country of ſome part of the taxes, which, from an abſolute neceſſity, they have been obliged to pay.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ The unſpeakable miſery and deſolation that has raged in ſome parts of Europe, cannot but be a ſufficient warning to us to uſe all poſſible precautions to prevent the contagion from being brought in among us; or, if thoſe kingdoms ſhould be viſited with ſuch a fatal calamity, to be in a condition, with God's bleſſing, to ſtop its farther progreſs. And as all other proviſions will be altogether vain and fruitleſs, if the abominable practice of running goods be not at once totally ſuppreſſed, I moſt earneſtly recommend to you, to let no other conſideration ſtand in competition with a due care of preſerving ſo many thouſand lives.

“ The ſeveral affairs which I have mentioned to you, being of the higheſt and moſt immediate concern to the whole kingdom, I doubt not but you will enter into a conſideration of them with that temper, unanimity, and diſpatch, that the neceſſity and importance of them require.”

Soon after the king communicated to both houſes, a newly diſcovered conſpiracy. Though there was no certain proof, the alarm ſpread with amazing rapidity, and excited, for a time, the ſame alarms as if the danger had been obvious, and on the point of being carried into execution. The habeas corpus act was ſuſpended for above a whole year; and conſequently the nation left, in ſome meaſure, at the diſcretion of the miniſtry. Some peers, and ſeveral private gentlemen were impriſoned; a manifeſto, ſaid to have been publiſhed by the pretender, inflamed the minds of the people. Some ſevere bills were paſſed againſt the catholics: and the preparations for war put the whole kingdom in agitation. To believe this conſpiracy real, there is a neceſſity for ſuppoſing that the conſpirators wanted common ſenſe, as they were accuſed of applying to the regent of France, whoſe intimate connections with the king of England were well known. The commons, however, avowed the certainty of a plot to change the government, and place a papiſt on the throne. Several perſons were accuſed; and among the reſt Chriſtopher Layer, a young counſellor of the Temple, was executed at Tyburn.

A. D. 1723. But the principal perſon that felt the hand of power on this occaſion, was the famous Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, a prelate of obſcure birth, but diſtinguiſhed merit, a friend to letters, and equally remarkable for his underſtanding and virtues. He was odious to the court, becauſe he had not followed its principles; and odious to the whigs, becauſe he had not followed their ſentiments. Being impriſoned, he denied the juriſdiction of the houſe of commons, and declared he would produce his defence before the peers. The proofs againſt him were reduced to two letters, intercepted at the poſt-office, written in a very peculiar cypher, and, to all appearance, fabricated by his enemies. The commons paſſed a bill, whereby he was to be deprived of his office and benefice, baniſhed the kingdom, and be guilty of felony if he returned; and that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon him without the conſent of parliament; but nevertheleſs, he ſhould not forfeit his goods and chattels.

When this bill came before the lords, it met with a very ſtrong oppoſition. The duke of Wharton, earl Cowper, and the lords Bathurſt and Gower, ſpoke againſt it with great energy: they diſplayed the danger and injuſtice in departing, in ſo extraordinary a manner, from the fixed rules of evidence: that ſuch a practice muſt for ever ſully the luſtre and glory of that illuſtrious houſe: that the admitting the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the poſt-office, was a very dangerous precedent, eſpecially as, in this caſe, it was taken for granted, that thoſe clerks might carry the ſimilitude of hands four months in their minds. They deſired to know from whom theſe clerks had received authority to intercept and open letters, eſpecially thoſe of a lord of parliament; and whether the clerks who copied theſe letters had themſelves intercepted the originals? or whether they had received them from any other perſon? "If ſuch proceedings as theſe (ſaid lord Bathurſt) are encouraged, we have no other part to take, but to retire into the country, and ſeek tranquillity and ſecurity, if we may find them by our fire-ſides. The leaſt correſpondence, the leaſt letter intercepted, may render us criminal." He inſiſted on the example of cardinal Mazarine, who ſaid, "That with two lines of a man's hand-writing, added to a ſmall number of circumſtances, proved by evidence, he ſhould be maſter of his life." Then turning himſelf towards the biſhops, who ſhewed very little favour to their brother, he expreſſed his indignation againſt the inveterate hatred of ſome perſons towards the biſhop of Rocheſter; "a hatred (added he) abſolutely inconceivable, unleſs they hold the ridiculous opinion of ſome ſavages, who believe they inherit not only the ſpoils, but the talents of an illuſtrious enemy, when they have ſlain him in battle." But notwithſtanding theſe, and other powerful reaſons urged againſt the bill, it paſſed by a ſmall majority, and afterwards received the royal aſſent. Atterbury retired into France, where he met with repoſe, eſteem, and all the indulgences that poliſhed ſociety can ſhew to men of ſuperior parts.

A. D. 1724. While his majeſty continued abroad, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, paid the debt of nature. This event greatly affected the king, and he haſtened over to England, it being uncertain whether the new regent would entertain the ſame views as his predeceſſor; and on the ninth of January he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot open this ſeſſion without congratulating you upon the ſucceſs of your endeavours laſt year, for the ſafety, intereſt, and honour of the kingdom. The riſe of the public credit, the flouriſhing condition of our trade and manufactures, and the general tranquillity of my people, are the happy conſequences of your prudent reſolutions. It is to be hoped that the few examples which were made of ſome notorious offenders, will be ſufficient to deter the moſt diſaffected from engaging in the like deſperate and wicked practices. The augmentation you thought fit to make to our national forces by ſea and land, has not only ſecured the general quiet of the kingdom againſt any ſudden attempts or inſurrections, but has alſo given me ſuch weight and credit in all foreign negotiations, as greatly contribute towards the preſervation of the peace of Europe.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I will order the proper officers to lay before you the eſtimates for the ſervice of the current year. I deſire ſuch ſupplies only as you ſhall find abſolutely neceſſary for preſerving the peace of the kingdom, and for the ſecurity of my people; and thoſe I hope may be raiſed without laying any additional charge or burden on my ſubjects.

"I muſt, in a particular manner, recommend to your care the public debts of the kingdom, as the moſt national concern you can poſſibly take into your conſideration. I am perſuaded it muſt be a very great ſatisfaction to all my faithful ſubjects, to ſee the ſinking fund improved and augmented, and the debt of the nation thereby put into a method of being ſo much the ſooner gradually reduced and paid off. It would be a work truly worthy of a Britiſh parliament to begin this commendable undertaking, and to make ſuch a progreſs therein, as, with a ſtrict regard to public faith and private property, may pave the way to this great and deſireable end.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In the preſent happy ſituation of affairs, I have nothing more to recommend to you, than that you would make uſe of the opportunity, which your own good conduct has put into your hands, in conſidering of ſuch farther laws as may be wanting for the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, for the employment of the poor, and for exciting and encouraging a ſpirit of induſtry in the nation.

"I am fully ſatisfied, that the trade and wealth of my people are the happy effects of the liberties they enjoy; and that the grandeur of the crown conſiſts in their proſperity: and I am as fully perſuaded, that all who wiſh well to their country, muſt agree with me, that it is the vaineſt of all deluſions to imagine, that the religion, laws, and liberties of this kingdom, can ever be ſecured, but by ſupporting the preſent eſtabliſhment, and maintaining the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line. Let us therefore heartily join in every thing that may tend to promote our mutual happineſs, and to extinguiſh the hopes of thoſe who long have been, and ſtill are reſtleſs in their endeavours to ſubject this nation to the whole train of miſeries that are inſeparable from popery and arbitrary power."

The principal, and, indeed, almoſt the only debate, during this ſeſſion of parliament, was in the houſe of lords, on the affairs of the army. During the laſt year, an addition of four thouſand men had been made to the land forces, on account of the conſpiracy; and it was now propoſed to continue the ſame number. The commons had agreed to it, and paſſed the bill; but the continuance of theſe additional troops met with great oppoſition in the houſe of lords. The earl of Orrery, and the lords Trevor, North, Grey, and Bathurſt, ſpoke with great force againſt it. They were anſwered by lord Townſhend and the duke of Argyle. The latter obſerved, "That if he ſaw the nation unanimous in opinion, that our religion, laws, liberties and properties, entirely depend upon the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and on the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his majeſty's royal family, he would readily give his vote for reducing the army; but he was very much afraid that ſome people ſo ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on diſbanding the additional troops, with no other deſign than that of weakening the government, and thereby have an opportunity of involving their native country in new troubles. And therefore thoſe noble lords who ſpoke for the reduction of the army, would do well, when they went down into their ſeveral counties, to aſſure the people, with whom, no doubt, their reaſons would not fail of having great weight, that their liberties and properties were entirely ſafe under his majeſty's government." After a long debate, the motion for diſbanding the additional troops was rejected; and the bill paſſed as ſent up from the commons.

On the ſixteenth of May, the king ſent the following circular letter to the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge: "We being greatly deſirous to favour and encourage theſe ancient and laudable nurſeries of piety and learning, and to enable them more effectually to anſwer the end of their inſtitution, by ſending forth conſtant ſupplies of learned and able men to ſerve the public, both in church and ſtate; and having obſerved, that no encouragement or proviſion has hitherto been made in either of the univerſities for the ſtudy of modern hiſtory, or modern languages, the knowledge of which is highly neceſſary towards gratifying the youth committed to their care, for ſeveral ſtations, both in church and ſtate, to which they may be called: and having ſeriouſly weighed the prejudice that has occurred to the univerſities from this defect, perſons of foreign nations being often employed in the education and tuition of youth, both at home and in their travels, and great numbers of the young nobility and gentry being either ſent directly abroad from ſchools, or taken away from the univerſities before the courſe of their ſtudies can be there completed, and opportunities frequently loſt to the crown of employing and encouraging members of the two univerſities, by conferring on them ſuch employments, both at home and abroad, as neceſſarily require a competent ſkill in writing and ſpeaking the modern languages; in order, therefore, to remedy theſe and the like inconveniencies, we have determined to appoint two perſons of ſober converſation and prudent conduct, of the degree of maſter of arts, or batchelor of laws, or of ſome higher degree, in one of the univerſities, ſkilled in modern hiſtory, and in the knowledge of modern languages, to be nominated by us to be our profeſſor of modern hiſtory, one for the univerſity of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who ſhall be obliged to read lectures in the public ſchools, at ſuch times as ſhall hereafter be appointed. And we have farther determined, that each of the profeſſors ſhall have a ſtipend of four hundred pounds per annum, and out of the ſtipend ſhall be obliged to maintain with ſufficient ſalaries, in the univerſity where he ſhall be eſtabliſhed, two perſons at leaſt, well qualified to teach and inſtruct in writing and ſpeaking the languages, which teachers ſhall be under the direction of the profeſſors reſpectively, and ſhall be obliged to learn two at leaſt of the languages, both the profeſſors and teachers taking eſpecial care, that the times and hours for teaching and inſtructing the ſcholars be ſo ordered as not to interfere with thoſe appointed for their academical ſtudies; which profeſſors and teachers ſhall be obliged once every year to give in an atteſted account of the progreſs made by each ſcholar committed to their care, to our principal ſecretaries of ſtate, to be laid before us, that we may encourage the diligence and application of ſuch among them as ſhall have qualified themſelves for our ſervice, by giving them ſuitable employments, either at home or abroad, as occaſion ſhall offer.' "

On the twelfth of November, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am perſuaded you ſhare with me in the ſatisfaction I feel at the proſperous ſituation of affairs: peace with all powers abroad; and at home perfect tranquillity, plenty, and an uninterrupted enjoyment of all civil and religious rights, are moſt diſtinguiſhing marks of the favour and protection of the divine providence: and theſe, with all their happy conſequences, will, I doubt not, by the bleſſing of God upon our joint endeavours, be long continued to my people.

"The ſame proviſion by ſea and land, for the defence and ſafety of the nation, will continue to make us reſpected abroad, and, conſequently, ſecure at home. The ſame attention to the improvement of the public revenues, and to the eaſe and encouragement of trade and navigation, will eſtabliſh credit upon the ſtrongeſt baſis, and raiſe ſuch a ſpirit of induſtry, as will not only enable us gradually to diſcharge the national debt, but will likewiſe greatly increaſe the wealth, power, and influence of this kingdom.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper officers to prepare and lay before you eſtimates of the expences of the enſuing year; and as they do not exceed what has been found, by experience, to be abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the kingdom, I make no queſtion but I ſhall have your ready concurrence in raiſing the ſupplies in ſuch a manner as ſhall be moſt eaſy to my people.

"There is one thing which I muſt mention to you as deſerving your particular conſideration. It is too manifeſt, that the funds eſtabliſhed for finiſhing the works at Greenwich hoſpital, and providing for a competent number of ſeamen there, cannot, in time of peace, be ſufficient to anſwer the expences of this great and neceſſary work. It is therefore very much to be wiſhed, that ſome method could be found out to make a farther proviſion for a comfortable ſupport to our ſeamen, worn out in the ſervice of their country, and labouring under old age and infirmities.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"You muſt all be ſenſible how much our preſent happineſs is owing to your union and ſteady conduct. It is therefore wholly unneceſſary to recommend to you unanimity and diſpatch in all your deliberations. The zeal and abilities you have on all occaſions ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt of your country, even under the greateſt difficulties, leave me no room to doubt of my having your intire and effectual concurrence in every thing that may tend to the ſervice of the public, and to the good of my people."

A. D. 1725. Great part of this ſeſſion was taken up with the trial of Maccleſfield, lord-chancellor. There had been, for ſome time, a murmuring againſt the inſufficiency of the maſters in chancery to anſwer the great ſums lodged in their hands by the ſuitors in that court; and it was ſuſpected that the large ſums they paid for admiſſion to their places, made it more eaſy than it ought to have been, and very much leſſened the enquiry into their qualifications. Theſe complaints were now riſen to ſuch a height, that Maccleſfield thought proper to reſign the great ſeal, hoping by that means to eſcape any enquiry into his conduct. But he was miſtaken. The king, on the ninth of February, ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, requeſting that ſome enquiry might be made into the abuſes committed by the maſters in chancery.

The rigour of the law cannot be better employed than in puniſhing thoſe who have abuſed its authority; and the commons determined that thoſe who had abuſed the power intruſted with them for the good of the public, ſhould feel the whole weight of their reſentment. They accordingly enquired into the complaints, and it was found that they owed their origin to the chancellor. He was therefore impeached for ſeizing the property of the widow and orphan; for having ſold the offices in chancery at exorbitant prices; and for having given up to his ſubalterns large ſums belonging to litigating parties, that his officers might indulge his private rapacity. The trial laſted twenty days, when he was found guilty, and condemned to pay a fine of thirty thouſand pounds, and to continue in priſon till payment was made. If corruption thus infects the magiſtracy, how great muſt be its ravages among the body of the people? Exemplary puniſhments are in ſuch caſes indiſpenſible; but unfortunately the more general the vice prevails, the leſs frequently the puniſhments take.

During this ſeſſion of parliament a bill was paſſed to reverſe the attainder of lord Bolingbroke, with reſpect to his forfeitures, his majeſty having before granted him a pardon with reſpect to his life. This bill met with a ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of commons; but after a long debate it was paſſed by a conſiderable majority.

On the thirty-firſt of May the king, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, and expreſſed his gratitude to the commons for the large ſupplies they had granted, prorogued the parliament. The behaviour of the lower houſe merited theſe acknowledgements: they were now as much too prodigal as they were formerly too penurious. The nation was leſs loaded with taxes at a time when the public complained of deſpotiſm. The king, as elector of Hanover, having intereſts, foreign to thoſe of Great Britain, his policy conſiſted in ſupporting thoſe intereſts at the expence of England.

The Scots, ever ſince the union, had unwillingly paid any of the taxes laid on the united kingdom; and had behaved, on all occaſions, as if they thought themſelves injured, when they were obliged to conbute any thing towards the public expence. The enemies of the government failed not to cheriſh this diſpoſition in the people, and, under the maſk of a pretended zeal for the old conſtitution, to inſpire the populace with a hatred of that which was now eſtabliſhed. The malt-tax occaſioned the greateſt clamour; and it was foreſeen that it could not be collected without expoſing the officers of the revenue to the utmoſt danger. At Edinburgh, indeed, the exciſemen were ſuffered to take an account of the malſters ſtock in hand; but thoſe at Glaſgow were obliged to apply to the commiſſioners of the exciſe at Edinburgh for protection and aſſiſtance, their lives being threatened if they dared to viſit the malt-houſes.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the commiſſioners applied to general Wade, commander of the forces in Scotland, who, on the twenty-third of June, ſent captain Buſhel, at the head of two companies of ſoldiers to Glaſgow. On entering the town they perceived a great number of people, who ſaluted them with the moſt abuſive language, and threw ſtones at them as they marched along the ſtreets, crying out, No malt-tax. The officer deſired them to forbear, for he meant them no harm. The provoſt gave him billets for quartering his men, but told him he could not put him in poſſeſſion of the guard-room, the populace having locked the door and carried away the key. Unwilling to exaſperate the rabble by breaking open the door, the officer ordered the guard to be kept at a public houſe, which he had hired for that purpoſe. Every thing continued quiet till about eleven at night, when ſeveral thouſands of the lower claſs of people aſſembled about the houſe of Mr. Daniel Campbell, repreſentative in parliament for Glaſgow, and threatened it with deſtruction. Captain Buſhel, deſirous of putting an end to the tumult, before the rioters had committed any diſorders, ſent a meſſage to the provoſt, informing him of the miſchief they threatened to commit, and that he was ready to give him any aſſiſtance. The provoſt anſwered, that he thought the number of his ſoldiers too ſmall to oppoſe the rabble, and therefore he thought it more prudent not to make uſe of them. Encouraged by the timidity of the magiſtrate they proceeded to carry their threats into execution; forced into the houſe, and ſtripped it of every thing that was portable. The magiſtrates took no notice of the riot; and though ſeveral of them were found next morning drunk in the houſe, not one of them was ſent to priſon. The officers of exciſe concealed themſelves from the fury of the populace, who threatened to puniſh them in the moſt dreadful manner. About four in the afternoon the cabal began to aſſemble again; and captain Buſhel, not knowing what their deſigns might be, ordered the ſoldiers to be ready at the guard-room, which the provoſt had now cauſed to be opened. The mob did not, however, long keep their ſecret, they advanced towards the guards, crying, "Drive the dogs out of town: we will cut them to pieces." The officer deſired them to deſiſt, told them they intended to do them no hurt; but if they continued to provoke the ſoldiers it would not be in his power to prevent their firing. This had no effect upon the rabble, they continued throwing large ſtones in ſuch quantities, that ſome of the locks and bayonets of the ſoldiers were broken, and ſome of them wounded. The ſoldiers were now ordered to fire over their heads to intimidate them; but this had no effect; they continued to advance, and threw ſtones in ſtill greater quantities. Exaſperated at this uſuage, the ſoldiers fired among them and killed three or four. This had the deſired effect; they were terrified and retired to ſome diſtance. The provoſt now deſired captain Buſhel to ſave himſelf and his men by retreating out of town, as the rioters were collecting all the arms they could find; and that a deſperate engagement muſt otherwiſe ſoon enſue. The captain followed his advice, and marched directly for Dumbarton; but was followed ſeveral miles by the mob, and obliged to face about and fire upon them ſeveral times in order to ſecure his retreat.

As ſoon as he reached Dumbarton he diſpatched a meſſenger to general Wade, informing him of the riot, and deſiring inſtructions how to act for the future. The general perceived the danger, and ſaw the neceſſity of enforcing the laws. He therefore ſet out from Edingburgh, accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, and the next day joined a body of forces, that had been ordered to rendezvous on a moor within two miles of Glaſgow, conſiſting of two regiments of horſe, a detachment of dragoons, and about two regiments of foot. The general now informed the magiſtrates that he was preparing to march into Glaſgow, and the next day, about two o'clock he entered the town. The troops advanced with ſilence and good order, and were diſtributed into quarters without any diſturbance. The next day the exciſemen proceeded to take an account of the malſters ſtock in hand, and had quiet admittance. The terms of the act were complied with and every thing continued in tranquillity.

The king ſet out for his German dominions on the third of June, and ſoon after engaged in new continental engagements. The emperor, who had always been diſtreſſed for want of money, determined to have recourſe to trade, and accordingly eſtabliſhed an Eaſt India company at Oſtend. This ſoon excited the jealouſy of the maritime powers, who ſeemed determined to cruſh it in its birth. The emperor, in order to ſupport this eſtabliſhment, and maintain it againſt the efforts of the Engliſh monarch, to whom he had not granted the inveſtiture of Bremen and Verden, terminated his differences with Spain. The treaty was ſigned at Vienna, by the duke de Riperda, a Dutchman, who to raiſe his fortune, had abandoned both his religion and his country, and was appointed prime miniſter to Philip V. The two ſovereigns gave up all pretenſions to their reſpective properties. Philip granted to the Auſtrian traders, the privileges which the merchants of other foreign nations enjoyed; and undertook to guarantee the Oſtend-company. He alſo promiſed an annual ſubſidy of four millions of piaſters to the emperor. The czar of Muſcovy entered into this alliance, and George was alarmed for his Hanoverian dominions. He therefore concluded, at Hanover, a defenſive alliance with France and Pruſſia. Theſe negotiations being finiſhed the king ſet out for England about the middle of December.

A. D. 1726. As this treaty had very little concern with England a ſtrong oppoſition was expected, and every precaution taken to procure a majority in parliament, and to ſpread reports among the people that the emperor having concluded an alliance with Spain, was endeavouring to diſturb the tranquillity of Great Britain; and that Gibraltar and Port Mahon, would be the firſt object of their deſigns. A general cry was raiſed againſt "the machinations of ill-deſigning people, the plots of a popiſh pretender, the proteſtant intereſt, the balance of power, the liberty and ſecurity of the kingdom." Political artifices calculated entirely to facinate the nation, and induce it to ſacrifice its intereſts to the affairs of the continent. Theſe meaſures being taken, the king opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the twentieth of January, with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have had ſuch frequent experience of the wiſdom and zeal of this parliament on many important occaſions, that it is with pleaſure I meet you again; and I make no doubt but that your endeavours for the good and ſervice of your country, will be as ſucceſsful as they have hitherto been.

"The diſtreſſed condition of ſome of our proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negotiations and engagements entered into by ſome foreign powers, ſeem to have laid the foundation of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten my ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, obliged me, without any loſs of time, to concert with other powers ſuch meaſures as might give a check to the ambitious views of thoſe, who are endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns. For theſe ends I have entered into a defenſive alliance with the moſt chriſtian king and the king of Pruſſia, to which ſeveral other powers, and particularly the ſtates-general, have been invited to accede: and I have not the leaſt reaſon to doubt of their concurrence. This treaty ſhall, in a ſhort time, be laid before you. By theſe means, and by your ſupport and aſſiſtance, I truſt in God I ſhall be able, not only to ſecure to my own ſubjects the enjoyment of many valuable rights and privileges, long ſince acquired for them by the moſt ſolemn treaties, but effectually to preſerve the peace and balance of Europe, the only view and end of all my endeavours.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the eſtimate for the ſervices of the enſuing year to be prepared and laid before you, which, from an unwillingneſs I always have to put my ſubjects to any extraordinary expence by any unneceſſary precautions, are formed on the foot of employing no greater number of forces than was thought neceſſary the laſt year, for which, if the ſupplies you give ſhall be fully and effectually raiſed, I ſhall be enabled to have a ſtrong fleet at ſea early in the ſpring. If the poſture of affairs ſhould, at any time, make it neceſſary to augment our maritime force, I confide ſo entirely in the zeal and affection of my parliament, that I aſſure myſelf you will enable me to make ſuch an addition to the number of ſeamen as ſhall be found requiſite.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is not to be doubted, but the enemies of my government will conceive hopes, that ſome favourable opportunity for renewing their attempts may offer, from the proſpect of new troubles and commotions. They are always very buſy by their inſtruments and emiſſaries in thoſe courts, whoſe meaſures ſeem moſt to favour their purpoſes, in ſolliciting and promoting the cauſe of the pretender. But I perſuade myſelf, notwithſtanding the countenance and encouragement they have received, or flatter themſelves with, the proviſion you ſhall make for the ſafety and defence of the kingdom, will effectually ſecure us from any attempts from abroad, and render all ſuch projects vain and abortive.

"When the world ſhall ſee, that you will not ſuffer the Britiſh crown and nation to be menaced and inſulted, thoſe, who muſt envy the preſent happineſs and tranquillity of this kingdom, and are endeavouring to make us ſubſervient to their ambition, will conſider their own intereſt and circumſtances, before they make any attempt upon ſo brave a people, ſtrengthened and ſupported by prudent and powerful alliances, and, though deſirous to preſerve the peace, able and ready to defend themſelves againſt the efforts of all aggreſſors. Such reſolutions and ſuch meaſures, timely taken, I am ſatisfied are the moſt effectual means of preventing a war, and continuing to us the bleſſings of peace and proſperity."

Theſe treaties occaſioned a long and very warm debate in both houſes. It was ſaid that the offenſive treaty concluded with France and Pruſſia was contrary to the act of ſettlement, which admitted of no war in defence of the king's poſſeſſions in Germany. But the court intereſt prevailed; the treaty was approved of, extraordinary ſupplies were granted, and both houſes promiſed to ſupport his majeſty, in caſe any attack ſhould be made upon his foreign dominions.

On the twenty-fourth of March, Sir Paul Methuen, knight of the bath, delivered the following meſſage from the king to the houſe of commons:

"His majeſty having nothing more at heart than an earneſt deſire to ſecure his own ſubjects the full and free enjoyment of their trade and navigation, and in the beſt manner to prevent and fruſtrate ſuch deſigns, as have been formed againſt the particular intereſt of this nation, and the general peace of Europe, has found it neceſſary not only to augment his maritime force, but to concert ſuch other meaſures, as may moſt effectually conduce to theſe deſirable ends: and as theſe ſervices will require ſome extraordinary expence, his majeſty hopes he ſhall be enabled, by the aſſiſtance of parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted and granted for the ſervice of this year, and to enter into, and make good ſuch engagements, as the circumſtances and exigency of affairs may require."

This meſſage occaſioned a long debate in the houſe of commons; but it was at laſt agreed to comply with, and an addreſs was voted to his majeſty, informing him that his faithful commons would ſupport him, and had agreed to the required augmentation.

By ſome miſtake this meſſage had not been communicated to the houſe of lords, though the king mentioned his hopes of being enabled, by the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted. This omiſſion cauſed a very warm debate. The earl of Strafford aſſerted, "that the meſſage was unprecedented, and ſtruck at the ancient privileges of the houſe of peers, who are the grand ſtanding-council of the ſovereign, the hereditary and perpetual guardians of the liberties and properties of the people, and, next to the king, the principal part of the legiſlature, and who, therefore, have a right to be conſulted in all matters of public concern." He moved, therefore, "that an addreſs be preſented to know, who adviſed his majeſty not to ſend the ſame meſſage to the houſe of peers, as was ſent to the houſe of commons." The lord Trevor, in order to prevent diſagreeable debates, moved, that the conſideration of that matter might be put off for a month; but lord Lechmere repreſented, "that the ſubject was of great importance to his majeſty's ſervice, to the honour of that noble and illuſtrious aſſembly, to the ancient conſtitution of parliament, and to the proſperity and welfare of the kingdom; that it ought not to be poſtponed at all much leſs for ſuch a length of time, as amounted to a laying it entirely aſide. That it muſt be for the ſervice and ſupport of the crown, upon all occaſions, to have the advice of both houſes of parliament; and as the meſſage was only ſent to the houſe of commons, and there had not yet been any communication with their lordſhips upon it, though it contained matters of the higheſt importance, it tended to undermine the foundation of the houſe of peers, and of the ancient conſtitution of the kingdom. That the rights of the people of England were in ſome meaſure invaded, whenever they were deprived of the aſſiſtance of that houſe of parliament, without whom no aid can be given to the crown, nor any taxes laid upon the ſubjects. And therefore, if this debate ſhould be adjourned to ſo long a day, it might be inferred from ſuch a dilatory proceeding, that their lordſhips were not as jealous of their own privileges, and of the rights and properties of the people, at this time, and as much determined to ſupport and defend both, as any of their anceſtors and predeceſſors had formerly been. That it was the unbounded inherent, and fundamental right of the houſe of peers, to alter and amend all money bills, which came from the commons; and though, in ſome late inſtances, the commons had diſputed that right, yet the lords had never failed to maintain and aſſert it. That according to ancient uſuage, all demands of ſupply ſhould come from the throne in the houſe of peers; and therefore all other methods are unparliamentary, new, and dangerous to the conſtitution." He was anſwered by the lords Onſlow and Townſhend; and theſe were replied to by lord Bathurſt, who obſerved, "That the appellation of parliament being given to the commons, and ſeparately from the lords, was indeed new and unprecedented. That this was ſo far from being the language of former times, that though of late the commons took upon them to begin all money bills, yet there was a time when they were ſo inconſiderable, as to apply to the lords to deſire them to provide money for the public ſervice. That if, at this time, the lords ſuffered themſelves to be overlooked in this manner, they might come at laſt to be voted uſeleſs, as they had formerly been. And therefore, leſt any miſtake at this time ſhould be attended with ſuch ill conſequences, as to encourage any evil miniſters hereafter, to a total neglect of the houſe of peers, he was of opinion, that proper notice ſhould be taken of it immediately, inſtead of deferring the farther conſideration of it for a month." The earl of Scarborough ſaid, "He did not deny, that the peers have a right to be adviſed with in all matters of importance, and to give their conſent to money-bills. But in the caſe before them, it ſeemed needleſs to ſend the meſſage in queſtion to the houſe, becauſe their lordſhips had implicitly given their conſent to the augmenting the number of ſeamen, in their addreſs of thanks, wherein the augmentation was hinted at. As to what had been ſuggeſted, that formerly the commons applied to the lords to provide money for the public ſervice, the reaſon of it was, becauſe at that time, none had any money to give but the lords, moſt of the lands being then in their hands; whereas, ſince the reign of Henry the ſeventh, the caſe is very much altered; and therefore they ought not conſider how things were formerly but how they are at preſent, and act accordingly." Several other ſpeeches were made on this occaſion; but the adjournment took place, and the addreſs was afterwards rejected.

Three fleets were now fitted out, one of ſeven men of war, under the command of vice-admiral Hoſier, and deſtined for the Weſt Indies; another of twelve ſhips of the line, for the Mediterranean, under Sir John Jennings; and a third intended for the Baltic, conſiſting of twenty-one men of war, and two fire-ſhips, commanded by Sir Charles Wager and Sir George Walton.

Incenſed to the higheſt degree at theſe proceedings, Spain made great preparations for war. A camp of about twenty thouſand men was formed at St. Roche near Gibraltar, and all the neceſſaries for a ſiege were provided. Preparations were alſo made at ſea; four thouſand ſailors were landed; ſeveral men of war were already at Cadiz, and ſhips purchaſed wherever they were to be ſold. The pretence for theſe preparations, was to rebuild the caſtle of Old Gibraltar; but it was very viſible that a blow of much greater conſequence was intended.

A. D. 1727. In this ſituation of affairs the parliament aſſembled on the ſeventeenth of January, and the ſeſſion was opened with the following ſpeech from the throne;

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I acquainted you laſt year, with the treaties of peace and commerce concluded between the emperor and the king of Spain. As that ſudden and unaccountable conjunction, gave, at the firſt appearance, juſt grounds of jealouſy and apprehenſion to the neighbouring powers of Europe, and the ſubſequent proceedings and tranſactions in theſe two courts, and the ſecret and offenſive alliances, concluded between them about the ſame time, have laid the foundations of a moſt exorbitant and formidable power, and are ſo directly levelled againſt the moſt valuable and darling intereſts and privileges of this nation, that we muſt determine either tamely to ſubmit to the peremptory and unjuſt demands of the king of Spain in giving up Gibraltar, and patiently to acquieſce in the emperor's uſurped and extended exerciſe of trade and commerce, or muſt reſolve to be in a condition to do ourſelves juſtice, and to defend our undoubted rights againſt theſe reciprocal engagements, entered into in defiance and violation of all national faith and the moſt ſolemn treaties.

"I have likewiſe received information from different parts, on which I can entirely depend, that the placing the pretender on the throne of this kingdom is one of the articles of the ſecret engagements: and if time ſhall evince, that the giving up the trade of this nation to one power, and Gibraltar and Port-Mahon to another, is made the price and reward of impoſing upon this kingdom a popiſh pretender: what an indignation muſt this raiſe in the breaſt of every Briton!

"Nor were theſe fatal combinations confined to thoſe parts of the world alone, but they extended themſelves unto Ruſſia, and had not the deſigns of that court againſt ſome of their neighbours been prevented by the ſeaſonable arrival of our fleet in thoſe ſeas, a way had been opened for invading thoſe kingdoms, and given a powerful aſſiſtance to any attempts to be made from other quarters.

"Such circumſtances would not ſuffer me and my allies, among whom there has been, and is, the moſt perfect harmony, union and concert, to be idle ſpectators and regardleſs of their own ſafety and the common cauſe of Europe, for which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty has been at a great expence this laſt year, in augmenting his forces; and the ſtates-general, ſenſible of the imminent danger, have not only acceded to the defenſive alliance, concluded at Hanover, but have come to ſtrong and ſeaſonable reſolutions for an extraordinary augmentation of their forces both by ſea and land. The acceſſion of the crown of Sweden is in ſuch a forwardneſs, and the negotiations with the crown of Denmark are ſo far advanced, that we may reaſonably depend upon the ſucceſs and good effect of them.

"This ſhort view of the preſent poſture of affairs, will, I am confident not only ſecure to me the ſupport and aſſiſtance of my parliament in carrying on this great and neceſſary work, in conjunction with my allies, but juſtify the meaſures hitherto taken, and the expences already made.

"The confidence you repoſed in me laſt year, has been made uſe of for the benefit of the public; and as the chief article of exceeding, has, by my equipping and ſending to ſea three conſiderable ſquadrons, fallen upon the head of the navy, I am perſuaded that the neceſſity of the ſervices, and the ſecurity, advantage, and glory, that has accrued to this nation from theſe ſquadrons, will ſufficiently ſpeak for themſelves, as long as both friends and foes, with joy and concern, confeſs they have ſeen and felt the effects of the naval power of Great-Britain.

"It is not to be wondered at, that the princes engaged in theſe enterprizes are very much diſturbed to ſee their projects rendered abortive. The king of Spain, impatient of the diſappointment he has met with, can no longer diſguiſe that enmity to us, which, for ſome time, he has only waited for a favourable opportunity to declare. He has now ordered his miniſter reſiding here to depart immediately from this country, leaving a memorial that is little ſhort of a declaration of war, wherein he again demands and inſiſts upon the reſtitution of Gibraltar. He does not himſelf deny the offenſive alliance, nor his engagements to ſupport the Oſtend company. He makes my recalling thoſe ſquadrons, which his conduct has put me under the neceſſity of ſending to the Weſt-Indies, and the coaſt of Spain, the condition of any farther correſpondence between the two crowns; and ſuppoſing the continuance of my fleet abroad to be actual hoſtilities, threatening to repel them with force to the utmoſt of his power.

"But not content with thoſe menaces, inſults, and infractions of treaties, his Catholic majeſty is now making preparations to attack and beſiege Gibraltar; and in order to carry on that ſervice, or to cover another deſign, has aſſembled a great body of troops in that neighbourhood. But as the preſent ſtate and condition of that garriſon, with the reinforcements I have ordered thither, give me little cauſe to apprehend, or my enemies to hope for ſucceſs in that undertaking, the certain and undoubted intelligence I have, that it is now reſolved to attempt an invaſion upon theſe kingdoms, in favour of the pretender, by an embarkation from the coaſt of Spain, gives me reaſon to believe, that though the ſiege of Gibraltar may probably be undertaken, the public avowed and immenſe preparations made for that purpoſe are chiefly calculated to amuſe the world, and to diſguiſe the intended invaſion, which I am ſurely informed has been, for ſome time, agreed to be the firſt ſtep, and beginning of the long-premeditated rupture.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"Theſe conſiderations muſt awaken in you all ſuch a ſenſe of our common and immediate danger, as will, I doubt not, inſpire you with a zeal and chearfulneſs in raiſing the ſupplies neceſſary for the defence of our country, and for making good our engagements with our allies.

"I receive too much ſatisfaction from the happineſs of my people, in their full enjoyment and future proſpect of peace, eaſe and proſperity, not to be ſenſibly affected with theſe new convulſions, and the unavoidable neceſſity I am under of aſking larger ſupplies of my people, and of deſiring to be enabled to make ſuch an augmentation of my forces by ſea and land, as the preſent exigency of my affairs requires.

"I will order the proper eſtimates to be laid before you, and ſuch treaties as I have made with foreign princes for the hire of foreign troops: and as the expence I was laſt year, in a particular manner, intruſted to make, has amounted to no inconſiderable ſum, and the public utility may again require the like ſervices to be performed, I hope you will again repoſe the ſame truſt and confidence in me.

"It is with great pleaſure that I ſee the time ſo near approaching, when ſuch a conſiderable addition will be made to the ſinking fund. Let all that wiſh well to the peace and quiet of my government, have the ſatisfaction to ſee, that our preſent neceſſities ſhall make no interruption in the progreſs of that deſireable work of gradually diſcharging the national debt. I hope, therefore, you will make a proviſion for the immediate application of the progreſs of the ſinking fund to the uſes for which it was ſo wiſely contrived, and to which it ſtands now appropriated.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have had no thoughts of making any acquiſitions to any parts of my dominions. My whole care and concern has been to preſerve and maintain the undoubted rights and privileges of my people, and therefore all my meaſures have been preventative and defenſive. But ſuch meaſures being now rendered impracticable, vigorous reſolutions, and a ſpeedy execution of them, can alone put an effectual end to the dangers that ſurround us. However hazardous and deſperate the enterprizes formed againſt us may appear to be, your being aſſured of their being reſolved upon, will, I am perſuaded, be ſufficient to prevail upon you to put yourſelves in a condition to reſiſt and defeat them.

"If preſerving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the poſſeſſion of the crown of Great-Britain, of infinite advantage to our trade and commerce; if ſupporting that trade and commerce againſt dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and, if the preſent eſtabliſhment, the religion, liberties and properties of a proteſtant people, are any longer objects worthy the care and attention of a Britiſh parliament, I need ſay no more to incite my loyal and faithful houſes of parliament to exert themſelves in the defence of all that is dear and valuable to them."

This ſpeech raiſed the zeal and indignation of the commons to ſuch a height, that, in their addreſs, words ſeemed wanting to expreſs the deep reſentment at the inſults offered the king, at the invaſion of the moſt valuable branches of trade, at the deſigns formed againſt the nation, and to applaud the wiſe meaſures taken by the king, to prevent the deſtructive deſigns formed againſt the liberties of Europe. They voted forty-ſix thouſand men, together with a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound.

But the upper houſe was leſs complaiſant. A violent debate at firſt ſeemed to promiſe a powerful oppoſition. Lord Bathurſt, after repreſenting the inconveniencies of the war, obſerved, that conſiderable ſums had been diſtributed in different places to give ſucceſs to certain meaſures, and recommended it to the lords to make a ſtrict enquiry into an object of ſuch importance. "As to myſelf, (ſaid he) I have never touched either Engliſh or Spaniſh gold; I am neither a Frenchman nor a Spaniard, but ſhall always glory in being a true Engliſhman, and in ſpeaking and acting for the good of my country, while I ſhall have the honour of being a member of this houſe." The meaſures of the king were, however, voted to be honourable, juſt, and neceſſary.

Nor was the houſe of lords the only place where the king's ſpeech was examined. The court of Vienna was highly offended, and paſſed ſevere cenſures upon it. The count de Palms, ambaſſador from the emperor, had orders to preſent and publiſh a remonſtrance, wherein the king of England was charged with giving an imperfect, mutilated, or very groundleſs account of facts. It was inſiſted, that the article reſpecting the pretender was falſe; that there was no offenſive alliance between the emperor and Spain; that the treaty of Vienna was no infringement of the lawful rights of England; and laſtly, reparation for the injury done to his imperial majeſty by theſe calumnious imputations was required.

This memorial was highly reſented by the parliament. Both houſes joined in an addreſs, expreſſing their indignation at the affront offered to his majeſty by the memorial of the count de Palms, and at his inſolence in diſperſing the ſame throughout the kingdom; aſſuring his majeſty, that this audacious manner of appealing to the people, and turning a memorial into a ſeditious libel, was a proceeding that created in them the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation.

"The endeavouring," ſaid they in their addreſs, "to inſtill into the minds of any of your faithful ſubjects the leaſt diſtruſt or diffidence of your majeſt's ſacred royal word, or to make a diſtinction between your majeſty and your people, is an attempt as vain as preſumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory of the glorious exploits, and important ſuccours (confeſſed to have been received from Great-Britain) gratitude, affection, and eſteem for this nation, will be beſt manifeſted, by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour; and juſtice to the people, whoſe rights and privileges the beſt of kings is now defending, againſt the encroachments made upon them."

The ſecretary of ſtate wrote a letter to the count de Palm, ordering him to quit the kingdom immediately. The two powers attacked each other at the imperial diet, by writings replete with perſonal animoſities. Nothing leſs than a violent and obſtinate war was expected. The king entered into new negotiations with France, Sweden, Denmark, and the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. Support was alſo procured in Germany, but not without being attended with a vaſt expence to England.

It was now determined by the miniſtry to obtain, if poſſible, a power to diſpoſe of the ſupplies. Accordingly a motion was made in the houſe of commons, by Mr. Scroope, ſecretary to the treaſury, for empowering the king to apply ſuch monies as he might find neceſſary to defray expences, and fulfil ſuch engagements as already were, or might be contracted before the end of the year. This motion occaſioned a long and very warm debate. It was ſaid by the miniſterial party, "That his majeſty was ſo unwilling to put his ſubjects to any extraordinary expences, that he had demanded no more ſupplies this ſeſſion than what he thought abſolutely neceſſary for the ſervice of the year. But, in the preſent poſture of affairs, ſome unforeſeen accidents might require a farther expence, for which no eſtimate could now be made, becauſe ſome treaties his majeſty had thought proper to enter into, were not yet finiſhed; and therefore, that the parliament ought to enable him to anſwer ſuch contingencies: that the houſe had ſeveral times repoſed the ſame confidence in him, which he had never abuſed, eſpecially as it was now aſked only for a ſhort time." To this it was anſwered, "That the wiſdom of parliament had always taken precautions againſt the improper employment of the public money; that a power ſo unlimited, and of ſuch dangerous conſequence, could not be admitted under a free government; that it was eſſential to the welfare of the ſtate, to preſerve the forms of parliament, to grant ſupplies upon eſtimates, and to apply the monies granted to the purpoſes publicly avowed and acknowledged as neceſſary: in ſhort, that if parliament ſhould diſpenſe with eſtabliſhed cuſtoms and principles, ſuch examples would become frequent, the crown would acquire an abſolute power of levying taxes, and the conſtitution of England would ſoon be annihilated." But notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, the court party prevailed, and the bill paſſed both houſes by a conſiderable majority.

In the mean time, the Spaniards laid ſiege to Gibraltar with an army of twenty thouſand men, well provided with artillery, ammunition, and warlike ſtores. Colonel Clayton, lieutenant-governor of the place, had troops and neceſſaries ſufficient for making a brave defence, till ſupplies could arrive from England, for which preparations had been made. But there was little to be feared from the attempts of the Spaniards; their meaſures were ill planned, and worſe executed: ſo that, after lying four months before the place, and loſing half their army by ſlaughter, ſickneſs, and deſertion, they were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

The hoſtile powers, notwithſtanding their reſentment, had not that paſſion for war which prolongs the miſeries of mankind. France effectually employed her mediation to reſtore the tranquillity of Europe. Preliminaries were ſigned, whereby it was agreed, that hoſtilities ſhould immediately ceaſe; that the Oſtend company ſhould be ſuſpended for ſeven years; and that a congreſs ſhould be held within that period, for finally determining all differences.

During the laſt two years, the king had not viſited his German dominions. He therefore prepared for his journey to Hanover ſoon after the breaking up of the parliament. On the ſeventh of June, he landed at Vaert, in Holland, and the next day proceeded on his journey. But on the tenth, about nine in the morning, he was ſeized in his coach with a kind of apoplectic fit, and died at Oſnaburg on the eleventh, in the ſixty-eighth year of his, and the thirteenth of his reign.

George I. was endowed with great qualities, a conſiderable capacity, diſcernment, policy, and a talent for negotiation. He was an enemy to parade, grave in his conduct, but not wholly ſuſceptible of pleaſure. That reputation for wiſdom which he enjoyed before he came to the throne, was tarniſhed by a government inconſiſtent with the principles and intereſts of the nation. Poſſibly the counſels of his miniſters carried him farther in this reſpect than he would himſelf have gone; but, indeed, the deſire of extending their authority is common and natural to princes. By making himſelf maſter of the parliament, he loſt the affections of the people, the greateſt treaſure a prince can poſſeſs. He was of a very generous diſpoſition; and the ſerenity and benignity of his diſpoſition were ſufficiently diſplayed in his countenance.

He married the princeſs Sophia-Dorothy, daughter and heireſs to the duke of Zell, by whom he had one ſon, who ſucceeded him in the throne; and a daughter, married to the late king of Pruſſia.

GEORGE II.

A.D. 1727. AFFAIRS on the continent were in a critical, though not dangerous ſituation, when George II. aſcended the throne. The nation was, however, in a very flouriſhing condition. Commerce, the great idol of the Engliſh, was every day improving, and riches flowed in from every quarter. The navy was on a very reſpectable footing; near two hundred ſhips of war were either cruiſing in different parts, or ready to ſail, on the ſhorteſt warning, to protect our trade, or annoy the enemy. Several regiments of well-diſciplined troops were quartered in different parts of the three kingdoms, ſo as to over-awe the diſaffected, and ſecure the peace and tranquillity of the whole; while they ſtrengthened the hands of government, and gave the new ſovereign an aſcendency, which had been unknown to his predeceſſors on the Engliſh throne for many years.

The parliament met on the twenty-ſeventh of June, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty declared, that the happineſs and welfare of his people, their rights, privileges and poſſeſſions, ſhould be his greateſt care. It, however, appeared, that his plan of government, with regard to foreign affairs, was the ſame with that of his father; and that he was reſolved to adhere to the engagements the late king had entered into by the treaty of Hanover, which, he told his parliament, had been attended with ſuch good effects, that he hoped ſoon to reduce the expence of the public.

After preſenting their addreſs of condoleance and congratulation, the commons proceeded to ſettle the civil liſt; and voted, "that the entire revenues of the civil liſt, which produced about one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds a year, above the yearly ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds enjoyed by the late king, ſhould be ſettled on his majeſty during his life." They alſo voted, "that one hundred thouſand pounds a year ſhould be ſettled on the queen during her life, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty; together with the palace of Somerſet-houſe, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Old-park."

Bills on theſe reſolutions being paſſed, the king came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he thanked the commons for the proviſions they had made for the ſupport of his family and the civil government, and for the ample proviſion they had made for the queen. Then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, he added, "It is a great happineſs to me to ſee the nation in ſo proſperous and flouriſhing a condition, at the higheſt pitch of glory and reputation, of great weight in holding the balance of Europe, defending themſelves in their juſt privileges and poſſeſſions, and vindicating the honour of the crown of Great-Britain."

At the cloſe of this ſpeech, the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ninth of Auguſt; but before that time, it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs iſſued for chuſing a new one. On the eleventh of October, the coronation was performed at Weſtminſter with great magnificence, and peace and tranquillity reigned in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1728. The new parliament met at Weſtminſter on the twenty-third of January, when Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; was choſen ſpeaker, with an unanimity which could only be inſpired by that opinion of his virtues and abilities, which his conduct afterwards ſo fully juſtified in a longer ſeries of public and irreprehenſible ſervices in that ſtation, than any other man ever diſcharged. The ſpeech with which his majeſty opened the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, breathed an air of frankneſs and ſincerity. He informed them, that he had a probability of ſucceſs in reſtoring the tranquillity of Europe. "I am very ſenſible," continued he, "of the diſagreeable and uneaſy ſituation in which our affairs have been for ſome time, and have been extremely concerned to ſee many of the inconveniencies of a war attending us, without any opportunity of reſenting the injuries ſuſtained, or gaining any of thoſe advantages in return, which the vigorous proſecution of ſo juſt a cauſe, and the ſucceſs of our arms, might probably have ſecured to us." He next proceeded to inform them of the difficulties that had ariſen in the execution of the preliminaries; and, "that though there was great reaſon to believe that the congreſs would ſoon open, and all difficulties be removed; yet, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general war in Europe, and had given the Engliſh nation advantages which would be loſt if their military meaſures were diſcontinued." After expreſſing his readineſs to lend all the aſſiſtance in his power for reducing the national debt, as ſoon as the intereſt of his people would permit, he recommended to their conſideration the increaſe and encouragement of our ſeamen in general, that they may be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the ſervice of their country; a conſideration worthy of the repreſentatives of a people great and flouriſhing in trade and commerce. He alſo recommended to them the care of increaſing the fund for Greenwich hoſpital; and concluded with recommending unanimity, zeal, and diſpatch. "This," ſaid he, "will convince the world, that none of you are capable, out of any views or conſiderations whatſoever, to wiſh the diſtreſs of their country, or to give an occaſion, from the proſpect of difficulties that may ariſe, and be fomented here at home, to interrupt or diſappoint our preſent promiſing expectation."

This ſpeech produced the deſired effect: the commons voted fifteen thouſand ſeamen for the ſervice of the current year; and twenty-two thouſand, nine hundred and fifty-five land forces, being about three thouſand ſix hundred leſs than the preceding year. The laſt vote was not, however, carried without a warm debate, on the general topics of ſaving to the nation; the danger of the conſtitution from a numerous ſtanding army, and the little effect which the augmentation of troops raiſed laſt year produced, or was likely to produce, in favour of Great-Britain, and which ought therefore now to be reduced.

The oppoſition were not, however, diſcouraged at the large majority that divided againſt them on the laſt queſtion. The very circumſtance, that of the duration of the miniſter's power, which, in any other country, would have irretrievably ruined their hopes, tended only to encourage them to believe, that it would at laſt effect his removal, if not his ruin. They were perſuaded that his influence, which, in matters of government, now ſeemed to be ſo deciſive, inſtead of being his ſecurity, muſt, in the end, prove his deſtruction. They were not miſtaken; but the great abilities of Sir Robert Walpole long baffled all their attempts.

The next conſiderable debate during this ſeſſion, was occaſioned by the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay. The ſum amounted to two hundred thirty thouſand, nine hundred and thirty-three pounds, for twelve thouſand men, horſe, dragoons, and foot. Theſe troops had been engaged by the earneſt requeſt of the late king, and to anſwer the ends of the treaty of Hanover. This was explained by Mr. Horatio Walpole, the miniſter's brother, who ſaid, that the tranquillity of Europe being ſtill precarious, the original reaſon which had been approved by the parliament for taking theſe troops into Britiſh pay, ſtill ſubſiſted. He was anſwered by Sir William Wyndham, who endeavoured to ſhew, "that the demand was prepoſterous, becauſe, by the treaty of Hanover, the contracting parties were to furniſh their contingencies either in troops, ſhipping, or money, within two months after demand made by the party attacked." To this it was replied, "that though the treaty did leave it in the option of the party called upon, not to furniſh his contingencies ſooner than two months after requiſition; yet, the ſtate of affairs in Europe rendered it prudent for his late majeſty to have in readineſs, at all events, the troops ſtipulated, which were cheaper to the nation, and more convenient for the common cauſe, than any Britiſh forces that could be employed: that the differences which, ſince the ſigning of the treaty of Hanover, had ariſen between the courts of Great-Britain and Pruſſia, (one of the three principal contracting parties in the treaty of Hanover) having occaſioned a material and unforeſeen diſappointment in the carrying the purpoſes of that treaty into execution, the reaſon for hiring and continuing the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay, became indiſpenſable: that experience had evinced the method to be wiſe and proper, becauſe it had preſerved the tranquillity of Germany, an object highly meriting the attention of the Britiſh nation; and that, upon the whole, not only prudence, but neceſſity, required it ſhould be continued till the event of the approaching congreſs at Cambray ſhould be known."

It was eaſily ſeen, from the very beginning of the debate, that the queſtion would be carried by the miniſtry; but the oppoſition, probably for no other reaſon than that of knowing the ſtrength of their party, called for a diviſion, when it appeared that two hundred and eighty were for the queſtion, and eighty-four againſt it.

Extraordinary ſupplies being neceſſary for the ſervice of the current year, a propoſition, in conſequence of a motion in the houſe of commons, was made by the lords of the treaſury, to the directors of the bank. This propoſal was, that the bank might advance one million, ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, for the purchaſe of ſeventy thouſand pounds per annum of the duty upon coals, to be converted into annuities; and that the bank be empowered to ſell or diſpoſe of thoſe annuities, at ſuch times and in ſuch proportions as they ſhould judge proper; and that the ſinking fund ſhould be applied to pay off one million at the bank.

The directors of the bank very readily agreed to the propoſal; but the city of London thought proper to preſent a petition to the houſe of commons, with regard to the coal-tax. They repreſented, that the duties already laid on coals and culm, brought into the port of London only, conſiderably affected their trade; and that the inequality of that burden was a great diſcouragement to the manufactures, as well as a great hardſhip upon the whole trading people in and about the city of London. They therefore prayed the houſe to take theſe reaſons into conſideration, and grant them ſuch relief as they ſhould think meet. This petition was ſupported by the anti-miniſterial party, but was rejected by a great majority.

The increaſe of the national expences, however, gave the oppoſition great advantages. They publiſhed a ſtate of the national debts, and attempted to prove that they were abſolutely increaſed ſince the eſtabliſhment of the ſinking fund, which was intended ſolely to reduce them. When the loan by the bank came to be debated, Mr. William Pultney ſpoke very warmly on that ſubject: he called the ſhifting of funds a perpetuating of taxes, and putting off the evil day; inſiſting upon it, that the ſinking fund was nothing more than a pompous project, which, ſince its eſtabliſhment, had ſwelled the national debt. Sir Nathaniel Gould, a very eminent merchant, ſaid, if he underſtood any thing, it was numbers; and he durſt pawn his reputation to prove, that the calculations made uſe of by the authors of the ſtate of the national debt were erroneous, and therefore not to be depended upon. Mr. Pultney was equally poſitive that the calculations in that book were juſt. But this being only a matter of opinion, Sir Robert Walpole attempted to juſtify what the merchant had advanced, and the diſpute was in danger of becoming perſonal, when Mr. Hungerford, a member remarkable for jocularity, interpoſed, and prevented it from having any farther conſequences.

On the twenty-ſixth of February, the whole ſupply, amounting to near four millions, was voted; and the particulars of the diſtribution of the money granted laſt year had been laid before them. But in this account two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds not being particularly ſpecified, they addreſſed his majeſty for a particular and diſtinct account of that ſum. In anſwer to this addreſs, Sir Paul Methuen, by his majeſty's command, acquainted the houſe, "That the late king, his majeſty's royal father, having, on the like occaſion, received from the laſt parliament the moſt dutiful acknowledgments of his great care and wiſdom, in taking ſuch ſteps, and entering into ſuch engagements as he thought would beſt conduce to the ſecurity of this kingdom and the preſervation of the peace of Europe; and, at the ſame time, the ſtrongeſt aſſurance of their future ſupport in all ſuch farther meaſures as he ſhould find neceſſary and expedient for preventing a rupture, and for the honour and advantage of theſe kingdoms: and a power being accordingly given by parliament to his late majeſty, for iſſuing and applying ſuch ſums of money as he ſhould find neceſſary, for anſwering and defraying ſuch expences and engagements as had been, or ſhould be made for theſe great and neceſſary purpoſes; ſome part of the money mentioned in this addreſs had been iſſued and diſburſed by his late majeſty; and the remaining part had been applied by his majeſty for carrying on the ſame neceſſary ſervices, for ſtrengthening his alliances, and in fulfilling engagements of the utmoſt importance to theſe kingdoms, and to the general tranquillity of Europe, and which require the greateſt ſecrecy. His majeſty therefore hopes, that this houſe will repoſe the ſame confidence in him, and be aſſured that the money has been neceſſarily expended, purſuant to the power given by act of parliament, and for the uſes and purpoſes therein directed; and that a particular account thereof cannot be given, without manifeſt prejudice to the public."

This anſwer, it muſt be acknowledged, was far from being conformable to the conſtitution of parliament, though it was not without a precedent. The oppoſition would not ſlip ſo fair an advantage; they attacked the miniſtry with all the power of reaſon and eloquence. They repreſented, that the anſwer was unparliamentary; that if ſuch were accepted, the parliament muſt give up their moſt valuable privileges, thoſe of enquiring into the diſpoſal of public money, and the conduct of corrupted and corrupting miniſters, to thoſe very miniſters who ought to be the objects of their cenſure." It was added, "That the anſwer was vague and frivolous, and might be made with equal propriety upon all occaſions of enquiry into the diſpoſal of public money." On the other hand, it was urged, "That this anſwer was conformable to an anſwer returned in the late reign, upon a ſimilar addreſs; that there was no more reaſon for diſtruſting his preſent majeſty, than there was for diſtruſting his father; and the houſe of commons was ſo well ſatiſfied on that occaſion, that inſtead of expreſſing any ſymptoms of diſſatiſfaction, they had returned the crown an addreſs of thanks for that anſwer." Sir Robert Walpole added, "That it was impoſſible the public ſervice, alluded to, conſidering the various complication of intereſts on the continent, could be carried on if every ſhilling expended for the intereſt of the common cauſe, and for maintaining the balance of Europe, was known to all the world." Theſe reaſons appeared ſatiſfactory; for, on the queſtion's being put, it was carried by a majority of two hundred and two againſt ſixty-ſix.

The Spaniſh depredations in the Weſt-Indies had long raiſed an univerſal clamour in the nation; and negotiations had, for ſome time, been carrying on with that court, for putting an end to theſe diſputes. After many difficulties, a treaty was concluded at Seville on the ninth of November; by the fourth article of which, the commerce of the Engliſh and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, are to be reſtored to their former footing, and orders are to be immediately diſpatched by all parties for that purpoſe. By the fifth, his Catholic majeſty engages to make reparation for all damages that had been done by his ſubjects to the other contracting powers. By the ſixth, commiſſaries are to be nominated, with ſufficient powers, on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who ſhall aſſemble at the court of Spain, within the ſpace of four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, to examine and decide what concerns the ſhips and effects taken at ſea on either ſide, to the time ſpecified in the preceding article. The ſaid commiſſaries are alſo to examine and decide the reſpective pretenſions relating to the abuſes that are ſuppoſed to have been committed in commerce, both in the Indies and Europe, and all the other pretenſions in America, founded on treaties, whether relating to the limits, or otherwiſe. And the ſaid commiſſaries, after having examined, diſcuſſed and decided, ſhall make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who promiſe, that within the ſpace of ſix months after making the ſaid report, they will cauſe to be executed, punctually and exactly, what ſhall have been ſo decided by the ſaid commiſſaries.

A. D. 1729. The parliament met on the thirteenth of January, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty congratulated his people on having concluded an abſolute peace with Spain, and thereby preventing the miſeries and confuſions of war. He aſſured them, "that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to make the ſtipulations of the quadruple alliance more effectual; and that ſufficient proviſion had been made for the indemnification and future ſecurity of the trading intereſt; and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction, both of the army and the fleet. He recommended to their ſerious attention the ſtate of public credit, and the hardſhips of poor artificers and manufacturers.

The commons were no ſooner returned to their houſe, than Sir Robert Walpole laid before them the treaty of Seville; and one of his friends moved for a particular and loyal addreſs to the throne, almoſt in the very words of the ſpeech. This motion was oppoſed by the country party, who were for ſaying no more than "to aſſure his majeſty of the ſteady and zealous attachment of the houſe to his royal perſon, government, and family; and that the houſe would effectually ſupport his majeſty in all meaſures neceſſary for the honour and dignity of his crown, and the intereſts and welfare of his people."

In ſupport of this alteration and omiſſion, many ſevere things were ſaid of the treaty, which had been publiſhed ſome time. Sir John Hind Cotton ſaid, that the miniſtry had impoſed upon his majeſty in calling the peace an abſolute one, becauſe the moſt important intereſts of Great-Britain were left to a future diſcuſſion. On the contrary, the miniſter maintained, that the peace was abſolute, and that no difference could happen in the execution of it, unleſs the Spaniards and other powers were encouraged to raiſe them by the diſſention that might happen at home. Several other ſpeeches were made on both ſides, but the motion for the omiſſion was rejected by a great majority.

The debates in the houſe of lords, when the treaty of Seville came before them, were of great importance, and carried to a conſiderable length. It was urged, that his Imperial majeſty would certainly detach himſelf from a people whoſe miniſters had concluded a treaty ſo eſſentially different from the quadruple alliance. To this it was replied, that there never was, nor could be, any eſſential difference, if the emperor was ſincerely reſolved to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance with regard to the eventual ſucceſſion to the dutchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; and that introducing Spaniſh, inſtead of neutral troops, into the garriſons of theſe dominions, could make no material difference, eſpecially as the treaty had, in the ſtrongeſt manner, ſtipulated, that the troops ſhould be withdrawn as ſoon as the ſucceſſion to theſe dutchies, which was a principal object of the quadruple alliance, ſhould be ſecured. It was farther urged, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in queſtion, and the quadruple alliance; yet the preſervation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining ſatiſfaction and ſecurity to our commerce, were conſiderations that ought infinitely to outweigh any apprehenſion from a reſentment that could be founded only upon pride and ambition.

Great exceptions were alſo taken by the lords in the oppoſition at the ſixth article, whereby the merchants, and others, who had ſuffered greatly by the Spaniſh depredations, were obliged to repair to the court of Spain, in order to make proof of their loſſes. This was repreſented as not only a diſcouragement to the ſufferers, but derogatory to the honour of the nation. This was, however, conſidered as an unreaſonable objection, ſince it was neceſſary for the merchants to apply where only they could have redreſs. The commiſſaries were to meet at the court of Spain; they could not properly meet elſewhere, becauſe the validity or invalidity of the captures complained of muſt be diſcuſſed in thoſe courts where the proofs remained; and the law of nations eſtabliſhes the ſentence of the court of admiralty of that nation where the capture is made, and to be final in all caſes, and in all parts. Had the Spaniards been the complainants, the cauſes muſt have been tried in Great-Britain.

After a very tedious debate, objections being made to almoſt every article, the treaty was approved by a very conſiderable majority. It muſt, indeed, be acknowledged, that the miniſtry, in concluding it, were chiefly deſirous of preſerving the public tranquillity, by which England was every day making immenſe acquiſitions of wealth, and improvements in commerce. But this was totally deſtructive of the views of the oppoſition, who well knew that the power of the miniſtry could only be ſhaken in a time of war and commotion. On the other hand, the miniſtry treated the oppoſition they met with too ſuperciliouſly within doors, and too incautiouſly without. Secure of their own numbers in the houſe of commons, and perſuaded that the oppoſition proceeded only from views of intereſt and ambition, they did not enter into that length and ſolemnity of debate that was neceſſary either for the conviction or converſion of the few who oppoſed their meaſures from principle only. They carried their meaſures rather by dividing than debating. Many noblemen and gentlemen of independent fortunes were provoked at this method of proceeding, and reſented it by voting againſt the miniſtry. This gave the public ſuch unfavourable impreſſions of his majeſty's meaſures, that nothing either ſpoken or wrote on the ſide of the miniſtry had a fair hearing.

A moſt excellent act was paſſed this ſeſſion for the better regulation of juries. Before this time, it was a reproach to the Engliſh law, that no proviſion was made to oblige men of ſubſtance to ſerve on juries; for which reaſon it was very common for perſons of property to throw the burden from themſelves on men of indigent circumſtances; and this opened a way for corruption in the moſt capital caſes.

Another act was paſſed this ſeſſion for granting liberty to carry rice from his majeſty's province of Carolina, in America, directly to any part of Europe ſouthward of Cape Finiſterre, in ſhips built in, and belonging to Great-Britain, and navigated according to law.

By this act, a general principle that had been eſtabliſhed by all the nations in Europe who had dominions in America, was broken through. It had hitherto been a maxim with every country, to preſerve all intercourſe with their plantations entire to their mother country; by which incredible advantages accrued to them in commerce and navigation. For this reaſon no commodities were to be exported from the Engliſh plantations, but in ſhips that firſt touched at England. But rice being a periſhable commodity, this act exempted it from the general rule; provided the ſhip that carried it belonged to Great-Britain, and was navigated by Britiſh ſailors. This act has proved very advantageous to that colony.

A great remiſſneſs of government prevailed at this time in England. Peace, both at home and abroad, continued to be the great object of the miniſter. Proſperity in commerce introduced luxury; hence neceſſities were created, and theſe drove the lower claſs of people into the moſt abandoned wickedneſs. Averſe to all penal and ſanguinary meaſures, the miniſter gave not that encouragement to the ordinary magiſtrates that could enable them to give an effectual check to vice among the multitude. This produced a very pernicious effect among the higher claſs; ſo that an almoſt univerſal degeneracy of manners prevailed. It was not ſafe to travel the roads, or walk the ſtreets; and often the civil officers themſelves dared neither to repel the violences, nor puniſh the crimes that were committed. A ſpecies of villains now ſtarted up, unknown to former times, who made it their buſineſs to write letters to men of ſubſtance, threatening to ſet fire to their houſes, in caſe they refuſed their demands; and ſometimes their threats were carried into execution.

A. D. 1730. In the midſt of theſe domeſtic diſorders, the parliament met on the twenty-firſt of January. It was generally ſuppoſed that the obſtinacy of the emperor would occaſion a war, he having given orders for a large body of troops to march into Italy, to oppoſe the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons, ſtipulated by that treaty. The king hinted at this in his ſpeech, at the opening of the ſeſſion; and almoſt the whole of his ſpeech conſiſted of earneſt exhortations to his parliament, to enable him to be ready to carry the treaty into execution by arms, if force ſhould be found neceſſary.

On the return of the commons to their houſe, a very loyal addreſs, in anſwer to the ſpeech, was moved for by Mr. Campbell; but the oppoſite party made a motion, that all the complimentary part of it ſhould be left out, and only promiſe to concur with ſuch means as ſhould be abſolutely neceſſary to procure the ſatisfaction due to the allies, and provide for the intereſts of the people; and then to inſert the following words: "aſſuring ourſelves, that his majeſty will take effectual care to prevent the breaking out of war upon the Rhine, or in the Auſtrian Netherlands; the preſervation of which, in the hands they now are, is of the greateſt importance to theſe kingdoms, and the maintenance whereof has coſt the nation ſo much blood and treaſure."

The chief ſpeakers, in ſupport of this motion, were Sir William Wyndham, and Meſſrs. Daniel and William Pultney, who enjoyed the infinite advantage of having on their ſide all the popular topics, which experience has ſince evinced, in many caſes, to have been mere ſounds; and yet, at that time, were of ſuch force, that the court party durſt not diſpute them. The power of France was repreſented as threatening the liberties, both of England and of Europe. Evidence was again offered to be produced of their having cleared and repaired the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the treaty of Utrecht. Great complaints were made of their encroachments upon us in the Weſt-Indies; and all was aſcribed to the pernicious connections we had lately run into with them. It was farther repreſented, that, for England to join with France in any attempts againſt the emperor, either in Flanders, or upon the Rhine, would be acting againſt the moſt eſtabliſhed maxims of the late glorious confederacy, that had humbled the power of France under the duke of Marlborough; and that it would undo the balance of power, which had been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and was the chief acquiſition which England or Europe had obtained by that confederacy. Some obſervations were likewiſe made on the danger and inexpediency of the houſe promiſing indiſcriminately the firſt day of the ſeſſion, to ſupport all his majeſty's meaſures and engagements, before they knew what they were; and that, in fact, ſuch an aſſurance rendered all their future deliberations, for that ſeſſion, uſeleſs and inconſiſtent.

Theſe arguments preſſed hard upon ſeveral in the houſe, particularly Sir Robert Walpole and his brother, lord Hervey, and Sir William Young. Being profeſſed whigs, they could not, with conſiſtency, deny, that it would be very dangerous for public liberty, ſhould England co-operate with the French upon the Rhine, or in Flanders, againſt the emperor; and yet nothing could be more plain, than that the amendment propoſed was impolitic in itſelf, and diſreſpectful to his majeſty. In the courſe of the debate, they publicly declared their ſentiments on this head; obſerving, "that if the amendment was agreed to, it would be attended by the worſt of conſequences, both at home and abroad, and appear as if his majeſty had intended any thing that was not abſolutely neceſſary for the intereſt of England, and ſtrictly agreeable to the principles of public liberty: that ſuch an inſinuation could only tend to diſcourage the friends of the proteſtant ſucceſſion at home, and animate their enemies abroad; and therefore they ought to truſt to his majeſty's wonted prudence; and, that the putting ſuch words in the addreſs would look like an encroachment upon the prerogative of the crown, and directing the operations of the future war." Lord Hervey obſerved, "that the houſe of Auſtria, as well as the houſe of Bourbon, might, by its ambition, deſtroy that balance of power, ſo juſtly dear to England: that as the conduct of the French court upon the continent could give no juſt umbrage, the deſtroying the houſe of Bourbon, only to enable the houſe of Auſtria to riſe on its ruins, was highly abſurd: that he did not doubt but his majeſty had ſufficient intereſt with his allies, to concert meaſures which would prevent every bad conſequence apprehended: and, that to agree to the propoſed alteration, would be making proclamation to all Europe, that the emperor might act as he pleaſed, ſince he was invulnerable at preſent in Italy, by the ſituation of his dominions, and the great number of troops he had there: if, therefore, the allies ſhould agree, that he was not to be attacked on the Rhine, or in the Netherlands, his majeſty and his allies had nothing to do, but meekly ſubmit to laws impoſed by the court of Vienna."

Theſe arguments being admitted by the houſe, and the propoſed alteration on the point of being rejected, one of the members moved, that it ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "that they would ſupport his majeſty's engagements, ſo far as they related to the intereſts of Great-Britain." But this amendment being ſubject to the very ſame, if not greater objections than the former, they were both rejected, and the addreſs, as moved for, was voted without any diviſion.

An amendment, in almoſt the ſame terms as in the lower houſe, was moved for, by lord Carteret, in the houſe of peers; but being oppoſed by the dukes of Newcaſtle and Argyle, it was over-ruled.

The rejection of the penſion-bill, during the laſt ſeſſion, having cauſed a great ferment in the nation, the oppoſition reſolved to bring it again on the carpet. The motion was introduced with great ſolemnity; and after paſſing, with very little oppoſition, through the houſe of commons, was ſent to the houſe of peers, where it was thrown out. A remarkable ſpeech was made on this occaſion by the biſhop of Bangor; wherein he plainly proved, that, under the maſk of popularity, this motion concealed the moſt dangerous tendency; and concludes in the following words: "Though this bill, at firſt ſight, ſeems to be a ſelf-denying bill, and to ſome particular members, may, perhaps, prove ſo; yet the commons, conſidered as an houſe of parliament, will find in it, no doubt, a great enlargement of power; and whatever tends to break the balance between the powers, eſſential to this conſtitution, muſt, ſooner or later, prove the ruin of the whole. An independent houſe of commons, or an independent houſe of lords, is as inconſiſtent with our conſtitution, as an independent, that is, an abſolute king; and whoever loves the liberties and laws of his country, will no more deſire to ſee the one than the other. Let bribery be puniſhed; let corruption be puniſhed; but not by giving ſo much ſtrength to one power of this conſtitution, as ſhall make it able to overbear the reſt."

The oppoſition did not fail to repreſent this ſpeech in the moſt heinous light. They cauſed it to be circulated throughout the kingdom, with their own notes and commentaries upon it; wherein they endeavoured to prove, that his lordſhip only expreſſed the ſentiments of the miniſter, who had formed a deſign of ſubverting the conſtitution, by deſtroying the independency of the two houſes of parliament.

The facility with which every queſtion was carried by the miniſterial party, was imputed, by the minority, to the remiſſneſs of their friends, in not attending the houſe; and having no compulſive power over them, they endeavoured to obtain one by the following method. A call of the houſe being ordered and held, two members, who were conſidered of the country party, were, by their friends, moved to be taken into cuſtody for non-attendance; but, on the interpoſition of the court party, they were held excuſed; which ſerving as a precedent, the ſame lenity was extended to ſuch as could plead excuſes of indiſpoſition, being on the road, or any other trivial cauſe. The majority, however, having afterwards taken this affair into conſideration, found that they had treated it with too little attention; and agreed, that certain days ſhould be appointed for the defaulters to attend; and, in caſe of diſobedience of theſe orders, they were to be taken into cuſtody by the ſerjeant at arms.

The real motive for this preparation on the part of the minority, was to ſtrengthen a ſecond attack they meditated upon the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſians in Britiſh pay: for, after the houſe had been furniſhed with all neceſſary papers, a motion was made for referring the eſtimate of the twelve thouſand Heſſian troops in the pay of Great-Britain, to the committee of ſupply. This motion occaſioned a very warm debate. Mr. Daniel Pulteney obſerved, "that wars had happened on the continent of Europe, of which, though foreign to the intereſts of England, ſhe had borne the expence." In reply to this, it was urged, "that commerce had connected England with the continent, though nature had diſjoined her from it: that the Engliſh, by their influence on the affairs of the continent, had acquired many advantages in trade; and in order to maintain theſe, they were ſometimes obliged to interfere in foreign quarrels: that ſome of the countries of Europe, which conſumed a great number of Engliſh commodities, had ſo little communication with the ſea, that they were inacceſſible to our fleets; and therefore, if they laid the trade of the Engliſh under any hardſhips or inconveniencies, or offered them any inſults or indignities, the Engliſh had no other means of aſſerting their rights, or recovering their wrongs, than by employing ſome of the powerful ſtates upon the continent to ſupport their reſentment: that this had frequently been found a very uſeful expedient to England; but that ſhe could not any longer avail herſelf of it, than while ſhe, in her turn, was ready to perform as friendly offices for thoſe ſtates. They aſſerted, that it was upon this very principle that the treaty of Hanover was concluded, and the Heſſian troops were taken into Britiſh pay; and that thoſe two meaſures had prevented the fatal effects which might have attended the ambition and obſtinacy of the emperor: that upon the ſame principle likewiſe was founded the treaty of Seville, which, by our engaging for the introduction of ſix thouſand Spaniſh troops into Italy, had effectually detached Spain from the emperor: that the latter, however, had filled Italy with his armies, in order to prevent the introduction of thoſe garriſons. It was alſo obſerved, that the Heſſians, who were in Britiſh pay, were the only curbs the emperor had in Germany; conſequently, that the diſmiſſion of theſe forces would leave him at liberty to kindle a flame in Europe, which might coſt Great-Britain many millions to extinguiſh.

Theſe were the principal arguments made uſe of during the courſe of this debate, and by which the parliament was determined to continue the eſtabliſhment of the Heſſian troops. Arguments to the ſame purport were urged when the ſubſidy to the duke of Wolfenbuttle was brought upon the carpet. The minority affected to treat that prince with great contempt for his inſignificancy and indigence; and in order to protract the time, and expoſe the meaſure as much as poſſible, a motion was made, and agreed to, for reading the third ſection of an act paſſed in the reign of William III. for the further limitation of the crown; which ſays, "In caſe the crown ſhall come to any perſon, not being a native of England, this nation ſhall not be obliged to go to war for defence of dominions not belonging to this crown." They likewiſe addreſſed for all the papers and treaties relative to the ſubſidy; but the ſame being referred to a committee of the whole houſe, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-four againſt one hundred and twelve; the queſtion paſſed in the affirmative, and the prince's ſubſidy was continued.

The minority now ſuppoſing themſelves more conſiderable than ever, and knowing, that ſince the reſignation of lord Townſhend, the management of foreign affairs had created public murmurs againſt the miniſter, reſolved to diſtreſs him as much as poſſible on that ſubject, by making motions, which, if carried in the negative, would heighten the ill impreſſions already conceived of him. They accordingly addreſſed for all the papers relative to the treaty of Seville; for an account of the progreſs of the commiſſaries appointed by his majeſty and the king of Spain in conſequence of that treaty, for adjuſting the demands and reparations due to the merchants of Great-Britain. The eſtabliſhment of a civil government at Gibraltar had been long a favourite point with the people; but being attended with great difficulties, it had not yet been put in execution: they therefore carried an addreſs for an account of all the proceedings that had been had on that account, and for declaring Gibraltar a free port, ſince the laſt application of the houſe to his majeſty on that head. Another cauſe for an addreſs, and which appeared too plauſible to be refuſed, was the non-compliance of the Spaniards with the treaty of Seville in commercial points, and their continuing in a manner to block up Gibraltar. This addreſs was for copies of ſuch repreſentations as his majeſty had received from the governor of Gibraltar, and from his majeſty's miniſter at the court of Spain, in relation to any works carried on at Gibraltar by the Spaniards ſince the concluſion of the treaty of Seville; together with ſuch orders as had been given thereupon. All theſe papers were accordingly laid before the houſe, but very little uſe ſeems to have been made of them, except furniſhing the heads of the party with materials for pamphlet-writing, which now raged in England to an exceſſive height.

The diſputes which had happened in the execution of the treaty of Seville, by the haughtineſs and obſtinacy of the court of Spain, threw Europe, at this juncture, into a very extraordinary ſituation. The emperor alledged, that the treaty was an encroachment upon him, as head of the empire; and that Don Carlos ought to have been introduced into Italy, and the ſucceſſion of the dominions there ſecured to him, by his receiving the inveſtiture of them from the emperor, and by the conſent of the empire; both which were ready to be granted when demanded. He alſo aſſerted, that the ſucceſſion of Don Carlos to the dutchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, was not the ultimate view of the court of Spain. In the beginning of this year, the duke of Parma died ſuddenly, and the imperial troops took immediate poſſeſſion of his dominions; but the dutcheſs of Parma, in order to retard the ſucceſſion of Don Carlos, was prevailed on to declare herſelf with child; upon which the imperialiſts publicly avowed, that they had taken poſſeſſion of the dutchies under the auſpices of the emperor, in the name of the infant Don Carlos, the heir, provided he did not come armed, but in a pacific manner; and a ſalvo was included for the iſſue of the pregnant dutcheſs, if it ſhould prove a male.

The court of Spain was immediately informed, by her emiſſaries, of this tranſaction, and likewiſe that a negotiation was far advanced between the courts of Vienna and London; whereby it was agreed, that the contracting parties in the treaty of Seville ſhould guaranty the pragmatic ſanction, by which the emperor's female iſſue was to ſucceed to his hereditary dominions. This intelligence, added to the commercial diſputes which ſtill ſubſiſted between the courts of Great-Britain and Spain, ſo greatly exaſperated the latter, that the marquis de Caſtelar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Paris, ſigned a declaration to the miniſters of the allies of the treaty of Seville, in the name of the king, his maſter, importing, "that his Catholic majeſty looked upon himſelf as entirely free from the obligations of the ſaid treaty."

On the ſixteenth day of March, a treaty was actually ſigned between his Britannic majeſty and the emperor, conſiſting of nine articles. By the firſt, a mutual guaranty of all the territories belonging to the contracting powers is ſtipulated. The ſecond ſtipulates a general guaranty of the pragmatic ſanction in favour of the emperor's female heirs. By the third, his imperial majeſty conſents to the introduction of the Spaniſh troops into the dutchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; and binds himſelf to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to obtain the conſent of the empire for that purpoſe. By the fourth, it is ſtipulated, that all parts of the treaty ſhall be duly and truly executed. The fifth entirely aboliſhes all navigation to the Auſtrian Netherlands, excepting the ſending, once only, two ſhips from Oſtend; and, by the ſame article, commiſſioners are to meet, on the part of both powers, at Antwerp, for ſettling a tariff between Great-Britain and the Auſtrian Netherlands. By the ſixth, it is agreed, that all points of difference among the contracting powers, or any of their allies, ſhould be amicably adjuſted; and that the preſent treaty is not to derogate from the force of any of the former treaties ſubſiſting between either the contracting parties, or their allies, excepting ſo far as they are inconſiſtent with the preſent treaty. By the ſeventh, the Engliſh, touching their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, are to be treated on the ſame footing as they were in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, and as it is uſual to treat a nation with which one is in ſtrict friendſhip. The eighth fixes eight months after the ratification for the acceſſion of the other powers who ſhall be invited into the treaty: and the ninth allows ſix weeks for exchanging the letters of ratification. Beſides theſe, there was a ſeparate article, which declared, "that the guaranty entered into by the contracting powers ſhould not extend to the emperor's dominions, which might be attacked by the Turks." At the ſame time, his Britannic majeſty declared authentically, "that notwithſtanding the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into the ſtrong places of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, yet that he had no intention to depart from what had been ſettled by the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, either with regard to the rights of his imperial majeſty and the empire, or to the ſecurity of the kingdoms and ſtates, which his imperial majeſty actually poſſeſſes in Italy; or, laſtly, to the preſervation of the quiet and dignity of thoſe who were then the lawful poſſeſſors of thoſe dutchies, and therefore he renews to the emperor the guaranty of thoſe countries." But to take away all ſuſpicion of the emperor's trifling in this matter, he publiſhed a declaration, of the ſame force and date with the treaty, importing, "that if the pregnant dutcheſs-dowager of Parma ſhould be delivered of a ſon, the introduction of the Spaniſh troops to that dutchy ſhould ſtill take place; and that if ſhe ſhould be brought to bed of a daughter, Don Carlos was immediately to be put into poſſeſſion of the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, by an eventual inveſtiture from the emperor and the empire." And his imperial majeſty farther declares, "that in caſe the dutcheſs-dowager ſhould be delivered of a daughter, he will immediately withdraw his troops from the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, to give way to the peaceable poſſeſſion.

Notwithſtanding the ſtates-general appeared as one of the principal contracting parties in this treaty, yet it was pretended that the nature of their government required ſome time before they could formally accede to it: but the real fact was, that the ſtates, at the inſtigation of the French, who were greatly chagrined by this ſecond treaty of Vienna, reſented, at firſt, their being excluded from all the negotiations previous to a treaty in which they were inſerted as principal contracting parties. France had, at that time, ſuperior influence in their government, either to the emperor or Great-Britain, as ſeparate powers, but was not equal to them jointly; and the Dutch, after making ſeveral reſtrictions, acceded to the treaty.

France was highly offended at the guaranty of the pragmatic ſanction by Great-Britain and the ſtates-general; and ſo far prevailed upon the Spaniſh miniſtry, that a joint reſolution was taken with the council of Madrid to render the execution of the treaty of Seville as difficult and as expenſive to England as poſſible.

The diſſentions that continued to rage in the Britiſh parliament, greatly contributed to encourage theſe attempts abroad. For while the government was making preparations for executing the favourite project of Spain, that of introducing Don Carlos into Italy, the parliament was daily receiving petitions, complaining of the Spaniſh depredations in the Weſt-Indies. Nor had the commiſſaries appointed by his majeſty, purſuant to the treaty of Seville, been able as yet to prevail upon the court of Madrid to name commiſſaries on her part, and conſequently, had not made the ſmalleſt progreſs in obtaining ſatiſfaction for the Britiſh ſufferers. Every petition afforded freſh matter for railing againſt the miniſter, for not declaring war, or at leaſt iſſuing orders for repriſals.

A. D. 1731. It is very difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to account, upon the principles of ſound policy, for the backwardneſs of the miniſtry to enter into vigorous meaſures againſt Spain, who ſeemed to pay no regard to the many remonſtrances ſent thither, nor even to the articles of the treaty of Seville. The miniſtry, however, proceeded according to the plan they had formed; and on the fourteenth of July, Sir Charles Wager ſailed from Portſmouth with a ſtrong fleet, and arrived at Cadiz on the firſt of Auguſt. But finding the Spaniards were not ready, he proceeded to Barcelona; where being at laſt joined by the Spaniſh fleet, he purſued his courſe to Leghorn. In the mean time, proper diſpoſitions were making for introducing, in a peaceable manner, the Spaniſh troops into the garriſoned towns of Italy. This was greatly facilitated by the ducheſs of Parma, who at laſt declared ſhe was not with child: upon which the imperial general reſigned to the duke of Tuſcany, and the dutcheſs-dowager of Parma, as joint guardians to the infant Don Carlos, the adminiſtration of the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, and marched with his troops into the Milaneſe. Don Carlos being thus quietly ſettled, Wager returned with his fleet to England.

A. D. 1732. The miniſtry now challenged the boldeſt of their opponents to mention a ſingle circumſtance neceſſary for the tranquillity of Europe, that had been unprovided for. His majeſty expreſſed the ſame ſentiments in his ſpeech, at the meeting of the parliament on the thirteenth of January. He aſſured them, that the general tranquillity of Europe was now eſtabliſhed, and that all his deſires on that head were fulfilled. "The ſhare of credit and influence," added he, "which the crown of Great-Britain has had in bringing about this difficult and deſireable work, and which redounds ſo much to the honour and intereſt of the nation, as it is univerſally confeſſed abroad, will, I am confident, be agreeable to my people, and acknowledged with gratitude by you. It is well known, that from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the ſeveral courts of Europe have been employed in finding means to execute, what the principal powers had agreed to, for the ſucceſſion of Tuſcany and Parma in favour of an infant of Spain; but the various jarring and contending intereſts were hard to be reconciled and united in effectuating a point of ſo much importance; the extended views and hopes of extending, on every ſide, further advantages, and the natural jealouſies and diſtruſts ariſing among the ſeveral powers concerned, were not eaſily deſtroyed. Such oppoſite principles and purpoſes had kept in ſuſpence, and unexecuted, what the court of Spain had very much at heart; and occaſioned ſuch troubles and diſturbances as embarraſſed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the intereſts of this nation.

"This happy ſituation of affairs," continued he, "will, I promiſe myſelf, inſpire you all with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch reaſonable zeal for the public good, as becomes a parliament ſenſible of the great bleſſings they enjoy. The duty and affection of my ſubjects are all the return I deſire for my paternal love and concern for them. My government has no ſecurity but what is equally conducive to your happineſs, and to the protection of my people; and your proſperity has no foundation but in the defence and ſupport of my government: our ſafety is mutual, our intereſts are inſeparable."

It is ſufficiently evident from this ſpeech, that his majeſty and his miniſters imagined the ſucceſs and wiſdom of their conduct had ſtopped the mouth of oppoſition, and given univerſal ſatiſfaction to the people. They were miſtaken; the oppoſition continued as ſtrong and violent as ever. The very motion for an addreſs was oppoſed; the miniſtry ridiculed for the inconſiſtency of their negotiations, and ſome of them perſonally attacked with the ſevereſt reflections.

Senſible that the acrimony with which all their meaſures, both at home and abroad, were repreſented, the miniſtry reſolved to make an eſſay towards recovering their popularity with the landed intereſt of England. This was no other than that of leſſening the land-tax by reviving the duty upon ſalt. Accordingly, when the houſe was reſolved into a committee, Sir Robert Walpole ſaid, "That in raiſing the ſupply voted, his majeſty was deſirous that the burden ſhould fall as equally as poſſible upon all his ſubjects: that it had long reſted upon the gentlemen of the landed intereſt; and that as no tax could be more general than that upon ſalt, though, at the ſame time, ſeverely felt by individuals, however poor; he moved, that, towards raiſing the ſupply granted to his majeſty, the ſeveral duties on home-made ſalt, granted, by ſeveral acts of parliament, to king William, be revived, and granted to his majeſty for the term of three years."

In order to ſupport this motion, he ſaid, he hoped the land-tax might be reduced one ſhilling in the pound; and obſerved how hard it bore upon ancient Engliſh families, who had many children, and but ſmall eſtates to ſupport them; but the reducing the land-tax might reſtore them to their ancient hoſpitality and figure, in their ſeveral counties; both which, by the preſſure of that impoſition, were now greatly reduced."

But this ſpeech was not received with that pleaſure he ſeemed to expect. Mr. Plummer, in very ſtrong terms, endeavoured to prove, that the reaſons for taking off the ſalt-duty was ſuch as muſt always ſubſiſt againſt ever reviving it; becauſe it was very juſtly conſidered as a tax that, of all others, was moſt burdenſome to the poor, and the moſt pernicious to the trade of this kingdom: that the very character of a right tax was wanting in this; for it was ſo far from taxing the luxuries of life, that it taxed the moſt ordinary neceſſities: that the motion, if complied with, tended to diſtreſs the landed gentlemen more than the land-tax itſelf; becauſe, by diſabling manufacturers from carrying on their trade, it diſabled tenants from paying their rents; and that it was, beſides, highly impolitical, ſince the revival of it might tend to alienate the affections of the people from his majeſty.

"I only deſire," continued he, "that every landed gentleman who hears me, would conſider what he would make of his eſtate, if we had no trade, no manufactures, nor any number of populous towns in England. Who would be ſuch a fool as to deſire to be relieved of one ſhilling in the pound upon the land-tax, when he muſt pay as much for the ſalt made uſe of in his family; and when at the ſame time he diminiſhes the yearly income of his eſtate much more than one ſhilling in the pound, nay much more than any land-tax ever amounted to in England. The land-tax is but an annual diminution of a gentleman's eſtate, he may perhaps be free from a part of it the enſuing year; but if, by the decay of our trade, and the charge laid upon the poor farmer, he is obliged to lower the rents of his eſtate, that will be diminution, which, I fear, will endure for ever."

This oppoſition was not expected, and therefore the arguments were the more difficult to be anſwered; eſpecially as the oppoſition conſidered the tax in the moſt minute particulars. The bill, however, paſſed the houſe by a conſiderable majority. It was oppoſed with the ſame vigour in the houſe of peers; and when it paſſed near twenty lords entered their proteſts.

The private domeſtic occurrences of this year are not worth mentioning in a general hiſtory; but an oppoſition very dangerous to the mininiſter, was now fomenting in the nation. The debates about the revival of the ſalt duty, and ſome other ſurmiſes, which had taken riſe from the complaints of the officers of the revenue in general made of the collection of the duties upon wine and tobacco, two capital branches of the revenue, impreſſed the public with a notion, that either a general exciſe, or an exciſe on theſe two articles was intended by the miniſter. The whole nation was alarmed even before the miniſter had openly declared his intention.

A. D. 1733. Such was the diſpoſition of the nation when the parliament met on the ſixteenth of January. His majeſty's ſpeech was ſhort and general, recommending "the annual ſupplies in the leaſt burdenſome manner; and exhorting the members to avoid heats and animoſities, and not to ſuffer themſelves to be diverted, by any ſpecious pretences, from ſteadfaſtly purſuing the true intereſt of their country."

But however inoffenſive this ſpeech might appear, yet an addreſs, which was nothing more than its eccho, was ſtrongly oppoſed. Sir John Barnard opened the debate, and ſufficiently ſhewed by his ſpeech that he was no ſtranger to the ſcheme intended to be brought into the houſe by the miniſter, and that both himſelf and all his friends in the oppoſition were determined to exert all their power to render it abortive. He concluded with propoſing an amendment to the addreſs, implying, "that the manner of raiſing the ſupplies ſhould be conſiſtent with the trade, intereſt and liberty of the nation." Mr. Sandys ſeconded his motion; and Mr. Shippen moved for adding, "and ſuch as ſhall be conſiſtent with the honour and juſtice of parliament."

Sir Robert himſelf ſeconded theſe amendments; but could not help obſerving that he had reaſon to think ſome very unfair methods had been made uſe of, to make the people complain without any real foundation. The addreſs, with theſe amendments, was agreed to, and his majeſty returned a very gracious anſwer.

Among the number of debates which engaged the attention of the commons, that relating to the depredations of the Spaniards was the moſt intereſting.

It was opened by Sir Wilford Lawſon, who made a motion to addreſs his majeſty, "that there be laid before the houſe copies of the reports made by his majeſty's commiſſaries in Spain, together with all letters and papers relating thereto, and what ſatisfaction had been made to the ſubjects of Great Britain for the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the depredations of the Spaniards in Europe or the Indies, purſuant to the ſecond ſeparate article of the peace concluded at Seville."

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that this motion was made merely to diſtreſs him; but he could not, without the utmoſt danger to himſelf, prevent its paſſing. The Britiſh reſident had preſented ſeveral memorials to the court of Spain, complaining that nothing had been done to prevent the depredations ſo long complained of in the American ſeas. At laſt the following cedula was obtained from the king of Spain.

"Whereas the Britiſh miniſter reſiding at this court, has repreſented to me, that notwithſtanding the orders I have iſſued to hinder the Spaniſh privateers in America, from committing hoſtilities againſt the Engliſh, and their ſhips frequenting thoſe ſeas; nevertheleſs not only ſuch perſons as have patents from ſome of the governors, of ſome of the ports in my dominions, but alſo ſome who have no patents at all, continue their hoſtilities under a pretence of preventing an illicit commerce; while the governors refuſe to admit of the complaints given in by the Engliſh, who have experienced ſuch unjuſt moleſtations, or to indemnify them of the loſſes they may have ſuffered hereby. My reſolution is, that the orders already iſſued for that purpoſe ſhould be repeated: whereby I command by theſe preſents, all governors in any port or place of my dominions in America, not to ſuffer any of my ſubjects to moleſt or abuſe the Engliſh, or any of their ſhips that ſhall ſail in thoſe ſeas, as long as they keep in their proper diſtances, and are not concerned in any illicit trade; and that my governors take ſpecial care, that my ſaid ſubjects do conform exactly, and indiſpenſibly to the royal laws and ordinances which treat of thoſe matters; and if any of my ſubjects ſhould commit any exceſs, contrary to thoſe laws, I command my governors to puniſh them, with all the ſeverity that the offence they ſhall have committed requires; as alſo ſuch as, without patents, ſhall go to ſea in order to commit hoſtilities, and make unlawful prizes: that the ſaid governors do hearken to, and admit all complaints that ſhall be made to them, from the miniſters or chief commanders of Great Britain, either by word of mouth, or by writing; taking care to do them juſtice at all times; and to give them teſtimonies of all that ſhall be tranſacted, and that ſatisfaction be given them, for the loſſes they may have ſuſtained unjuſtly by the ſubjects, who may have occaſioned them, and who ought to make them good; for ſuch is my will: and the aforeſaid governors are to underſtand that they ſhall be made accountable for the exceſſes committed by the privateers; becauſe, before they grant them patents to go to ſea, they ought to examine them who the perſons are, and inſiſt upon proper ſecurities."

Theſe conceſſions on the part of Spain might have been ſatisfactory between two miniſters, who were not accountable for their conduct to any but their maſters; but were far from being ſo to a Britiſh parliament. It was inſiſted upon by the oppoſition, that the expreſſion in the catholic king's cedula, of proper diſtances to be kept by Britiſh ſhips on the coaſts of America, was a fallacious condition, and tended to defeat the whole purpoſe which England ought to expect from the cedula. Becauſe it was impoſſible for ſhips, ſailing from one Britiſh colony to another, to be able to perform their voyages without being ſometimes forced by accidents of winds and tides to come within diſtances of the Spaniſh coaſts, which the Spaniards might judge to be improper diſtances, and therefore a ſufficient cauſe for capture, according to the ſecret orders they might have from the court of Madrid.

Theſe reaſons formed the foundation of Sir Wilfred Lawſon's motion; and had prevented the Spaniſh and Engliſh commiſſaries from entering on a deciſive plan for putting a final period to the differences that had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two nations.

This Sir Robert Walpole plainly perceived, and was very ſenſible the oppoſition had gained a very material advantage over him; but he acted with great addreſs. He frankly owned, "That his majeſty had nothing to lay before the houſe, relative to the motion which had been made, becauſe many unforeſeen accidents had prevented the commiſſaries from entering upon buſineſs ſooner than the month of February laſt: adding, that the delays they at firſt met with, rendered it neceſſary to prolong the time for ſettling and adjuſting thoſe matters; and accordingly it had been agreed between the two nations, that the three years ſhall be computed from that day in February laſt, on which the commiſſioners firſt met; and by that time, it is hoped, all thoſe affairs will be ſettled in ſuch a manner, as will give full ſatisfaction to every member of this houſe, and ſufficient reparation to every one of the ſubjects of Great-Britain, who have met with a real injury from the Spaniards."

This apology was treated with great contempt by the oppoſition. It was ſaid, "that the houſe ought not to take, from any member of it, an anſwer which they could regularly have from his majeſty only: that as the commiſſaries had large ſtated ſalaries, it was not to be ſuppoſed they would be in a great hurry to loſe them, by bringing the affair of their commiſſion to a ſpeedy iſſue: that in conſequence of the vigorous remonſtrances made in the laſt ſeſſions of parliament, ſome Engliſh ſhips had been ſent to the Spaniſh coaſt, to demand ſatisfaction; but having been treated with inſults by the Spaniards, the commander, with the ſpirit of a true Engliſhman, ſeized the firſt Spaniſh ſhip he could meet with. This Spaniſh ſhip was, however, ordered to be reſtored, though the Spaniards have never thought proper to return their capture, nor have the owners received any ſatisfaction for the loſs they have ſuſtained."

To this fact it was anſwered, that though the Engliſh veſſel in queſtion had not been releaſed, yet it was not owing to the orders of his Catholic majeſty, which were pacific, but to the chicanery, excuſes, and delays of the Spaniſh governors in America, who, notwithſtanding the expreſs orders from their court for delivering up the ſhip and cargo, had found ſome pretences for delay." This explanation was, however, far from being ſatisfactory: it was ſaid, "that if the orders of his Catholic majeſty were not obeyed, it would be in vain to carry on negotiations at the court of Madrid; but imitate the conduct of the Engliſh commander, and demand ſatisfaction from the American governors." Though the miniſter could eaſily have put a negative upon this amendment, yet he well knew it would render him extremely unpopular, which he was very deſirous of avoiding: he therefore ſuffered the motion to be carried; and the addreſs, with the propoſed amendments, was preſented to his majeſty, who returned a moſt gracious anſwer.

The ferment in the nation every day increaſed, in expectation of a plan formed by Sir Robert Walpole, and generally known by the appellation of the Exciſe-ſcheme, which the miniſter had openly declared he intended to bring into the houſe. The nature of this ſcheme was ſtill a ſecret; yet it was confidently given out by the oppoſition to be nothing leſs than a general exciſe, though the miniſter had never entertained any thought of that kind. He added, that all he intended was to prevent the frauds committed in collecting the duties upon wine and tobacco. The fourteenth of March was appointed for laying the whole ſcheme before the houſe. In the mean time, ſeveral pamphlets and papers were publiſhed on the ſubject of exciſe, and the whole painted in the moſt horrid colours by the anti-miniſterial writers. Theſe writings produced the deſired effect; they raiſed an univerſal clamour againſt the miniſter, even before it had been offered to the parliament.

On the fourteenth of March, Sir Robert, in a long ſtudied ſpeech, explained his ſcheme. He began with taking notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his propoſal, before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices had originally ariſen from ſmugglers and unfair traders, who had enriched themſelves by cheating the public; and that theſe had been ſtrenuouſly aſſiſted by another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds daily committed in that branch of the revenue ariſing from tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill uſuage they had met with from their factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters; upon the injury done to the fair trader; and upon the loſs ſuſtained by the public in reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted, that the ſcheme he was going to propoſe, would remove all theſe inconveniencies, prevent numberleſs frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add two or three hundred thouſand pounds a year to the revenue. He entered into a long detail of the frauds practiſed by the unfair dealers in thoſe commodities; he recited the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the duties on wine and tobacco; he declared he had no intention to promote a general exciſe; and he endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to his plan, which he now proceeded to explain. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the former ſubſidy of three farthings per pound, chargeable on imported tobacco, ſhould be ſtill levied at the cuſtom-houſe, and payable, as before, to his majeſty's civil liſt: that the tobacco ſhould then be lodged in warehouſes appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of exciſe: that the keeper of each warehouſe, appointed alſo by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one lock and key, and the merchant importer another; and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured till the merchant ſhould find vent for it either for foreign or home conſumption: that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound, paid at its firſt importation, and then exported without any farther trouble: that the portion deſigned for home conſumption ſhould, in the preſence of the warehouſe-keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconveniency of paying the duty on importation, or of giving bond, and finding ſecurities for the payment before he found a market for the commodity: that all the penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould, for the future, be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe, ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majeſty, and in the country by the judge of aſſize upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner, without the formality of proceeding in courts of law and equity.

Such was the ſubſtance of the famous exciſe-ſcheme, the propoſing of which occaſioned the moſt intereſting debate that could happen in a Britiſh houſe of commons. It held till two o'clock the next morning, and was managed by the moſt able ſpeakers on both ſides of the queſtion. Thoſe who argued againſt the ſcheme, accuſed the miniſter of having miſrepreſented the frauds, and made falſe calculations with regard to the hardſhips under which the planters were ſaid to labour. They affirmed that the planters had never thought of complaining till they were put upon it by letters and applications from London: that the ſcheme was ſo far from being calculated to relieve the planters, that the factors would be expoſed to ſuch grievous oppreſſions, as would render it impoſſible for them to continue the trade, whence the planters muſt be ruined; and that, after all, it would not prevent the frauds againſt which it was ſaid to be provided: that from the examination of the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, it appeared that thoſe frauds did not exceed forty thouſand pounds a year, and might, in a great meaſure, be aboliſhed by a due execution of the laws in being; conſequently, the ſcheme was unneceſſary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, deſtructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the ſubject, as it tended to promote a general exciſe, which was in all countries conſidered as a very grievous oppreſſion. They ſuggeſted, that it would produce an additional ſwarm of officers and warehouſe-keepers appointed and paid by the treaſury, which could not fail of multiplying the dependents on the crown, and enable it ſtill farther to check the freedom of elections: that the traders would become ſlaves to exciſemen and warehouſe-keepers, as they would be debarred all acceſs to their own commodities, except at certain hours, when they were attended by theſe officers: that the merchant, for every pound of tobacco he ſhould ſell, would be obliged to make a journey, or ſend a meſſenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay; and that if a law ſhould be enacted in favour of this ſcheme, it would, in all probability, be, ſome time or other, uſed as a precedent for introducing exciſe laws into every branch of the revenue; and whenever this happened, the boaſted liberties of England would be no more.

But notwithſtanding theſe, and other powerful reaſons, which were urged by the oppoſition, the queſtion being put, upon a motion made by the miniſter, that the preſent duties on wine and tobacco ſhould, from and after the twenty-fourth of June next, ceaſe and determine, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſixty-one. The other reſolutions ſubſequent to this, for altering the cuſtoms to an inland duty upon theſe commodities, and for appropriating this inland duty to the ſame uſes as the cuſtoms, were paſſed without a diviſion.

On the ſixteenth, the committee made their report, and a very long and warm debate enſued; but the queſtion being put, it was carried in the affirmative, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, purſuant to theſe reſolutions. It was accordingly preſented to the houſe on the fourth of April, and read the firſt time; and, after a very powerful oppoſition, ordered to be read a ſecond time. The whole trading part of the nation was now alarmed; and the lord-mayor having procured a copy of the bill, laid it before the common-council, where it was unanimouſly reſolved to petition the houſe againſt it. The petition was immediately drawn up, and preſented to the houſe by the ſheriffs. As ſoon as it was read, Sir John Barnard roſe, and, in a very expreſſive manner, repreſented how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading cities and towns in the kingdom, would be affected by the bill for altering the method of raiſing the duties payable upon tobacco, and how juſt reaſon they had to inſiſt upon being heard by their council againſt it. He ſaid, that he would not entertain a ſuſpicion that the miniſtry wiſhed not to hear every thing that could, with reaſon, be advanced againſt the bill; and therefore moved, that the petitioners might be heard by their council againſt it.

This motion, however reaſonable it might appear, was ſtrongly oppoſed. It was inſiſted upon, that it had always been the practice of that houſe never to receive any petition, much leſs to admit council to be heard againſt any bill for impoſing taxes on the ſubject; becauſe it would then be impoſſible ever to paſs any ſuch bill, as the number of petitions preſented againſt it would, doubtleſs, be too great to examine during one ſeſſion of parliament; that no inconveniency could ariſe in refuſing to admit council to be heard againſt it, becauſe every man, and every body of men, had their repreſentatives in that houſe, who would certainly eſpouſe their cauſe, ſhould they think themſelves aggrieved by any particular hardſhip.

To this it was anſwered, that the houſe had never pretended to any particular cuſtom of refuſing petitions, except againſt thoſe bills which were called money-bills; that is, ſuch as were brought in for raiſing money for the ſervice of the current year; and that even with regard to them, there were many precedents where the houſe had admitted the parties, whom they thought to be particularly intereſted, to be heard by their council againſt the paſſing ſuch bills; that the admitting council, even in ſuch caſes, could never prevent their paſſing, becauſe the houſe could order all perſons petitioning to be heard at one time; and give ſuch directions, that it could never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the petitioners: that tho' every part of the nation had their repreſentatives in that houſe, yet it was very well known, that ſpeaking in public was not the talent of every man; whence it might happen, that the particular perſons, or part of the nation that would be moſt aggrieved, might not have any ſuch members who could lay their caſe properly, clearly, and fully, before the houſe; and therefore it was proper, even with regard to money-bills, to admit parties to be heard by counſel againſt them, when it appeared that they were particularly intereſted in the tranſaction. But with regard to the caſe before them, there was not the leaſt pretence for refuſing the requeſt of the petition, becauſe the bill againſt which it was preſented was no money-bill; on the contrary, it was inſiſted on by the advocates for it, as one of the greateſt arguments in its favour, that there were no new duties to be impoſed; it was a bill intended only to alter the method of collecting the taxes already impoſed; and therefore it could never be pretended, that there was any practice or cuſtom of the houſe to refuſe parties intereſted to be heard againſt ſuch a bill: that if there had been ſuch a cuſtom introduced, it ought not to be obſerved, eſpecially when ſo conſiderable a body as the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, came with an humble petition to be heard againſt the bill, which they thought would not only be highly injurious to them in particular, but deſtructive to the trade and commerce of the whole nation. The motion was, however, rejected by a majority of ſeventeen only. The petition was therefore ordered to lie upon the table till the bill ſhould be read a ſecond time.

While the bill was depending before the commons, the minds of the people were wrought up to ſuch a pitch of fury and reſentment, as ſeemed to threaten nothing leſs than a rebellion. The houſe was ſurrounded with crowds of people; moſt of the principal merchants of London attended in the court of requeſts and lobby of the houſe of commons. This exaſperated the miniſter, who, after declaring that he did not conſider the clamours without doors to be the voice of the people, concluded his ſpeech with the following incautious and inflammatory expreſſions: “ Gentlemen may ſay what they pleaſe of the multitudes now at the door, and in the avenues leading to this houſe: they may call them a modeſt multitude, if they will; but whatever temper they were in when they came hither, it may be very much altered now, after having waited ſo long at our door: it may be a very eaſy matter for ſome deſigning, ſeditious perſon, to raiſe a tumult and diſorder among them; and when tumults are once begun, no man knows where they may end: he is a greater man than any I know in the nation, that could, with the ſame facility, appeaſe them. For this reaſon, I muſt think, that it was neither prudent nor regular to uſe any methods for bringing ſuch multitudes to this place, under any pretence whatever. Gentlemen may give them what name they think fit: it may be ſaid they came hither as humble ſupplicants; but I know whom the law calls ſturdy beggars; and thoſe who brought them hither could not be certain but that they might have behaved in the ſame manner.”

The houſe was immediately in a flame; and it was ſome time before the temper of the members was ſettled ſufficiently to renew the debate. At laſt Sir John Barnard aroſe; and after making ſeveral obſervations on the beginning of the miniſter's ſpeech, ſaid, “ that any ſet of gentlemen or merchants might take what method they pleaſed to ſollicit their friends and perſons of figure and character, to come down to the court of requeſts, and to our lobby, in order to petition their acquaintance againſt any ſcheme or project they think may be prejudicial to their intereſts. This is the undoubted right of the ſubject, and what has been always practiſed. The honourable gentleman talks of ſturdy beggars: I do not know what ſort of people may now be at our door, becauſe I have not lately been out of the houſe, but I believe they are the ſame ſort of people that were there when I came in; and then, I can aſſure you, that I ſaw none but ſuch as deſerved the name of ſturdy beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himſelf, or any gentleman whatever. It is well known, that the city of London was ſufficiently apprized of what was this day to come under our deliberation. Where they procured their information, I know not; but I am very certain they had a right notion of this ſcheme; and were ſo generally and zealouſly bent againſt it, that whatever methods may have been uſed to call them hither, I am ſure it would have been impoſſible to have found any legal method to have prevented their coming.”

But though the miniſter carried his point with regard both to the London petition, and to the bill's being read a ſecond time, yet he thought it highly prudent not to puſh his ſcheme any farther. He could not hope that the majority ever would be greater, and a queſtion of ſuch importance to the public tranquillity, carried by a majority of only ſeventeen, was worſe than loſt. He therefore wiſely determined to let it drop; and accordingly, when the day came for its being read a ſecond time, Sir Robert Walpole moved, that it might be put off till the twelfth of June next.

Thus ended the famous exciſe ſcheme, a project which the populace were perſuaded threatened the entire deſtruction of their liberties; but which, now the rage of party has ſubſided, and the whole has been conſidered by the calm methods of unbiaſſed reaſon, has loſt great part of its horror, and even conſidered in a very favourable light.

On the eleventh of June, his majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he ſeverely reflected on the authors of the heats and animoſities that had been lately ſpread through the nation. “ I cannot,” ſaid he, “ paſs by, unobſerved, the wicked endeavours that have been lately made uſe of to inflame the minds of the people, and, by the moſt unjuſt miſrepreſentations, to raiſe tumults and diſorders that almoſt threatened the peace of the kingdom; but I depend upon the force of truth to remove the groundleſs jealouſies that have been raiſed of deſigns carrying on againſt the liberties of my people; and, upon your own fidelity, to defeat and fruſtrate the expectations of ſuch as delight in confuſion. It is my inclination, and has always been my ſtudy, to preſerve the religious and civil rights of all my ſubjects. Let it be your care to undeceive the deluded, and to make them ſenſible of their preſent happineſs, and the hazard they run of being unwarily drawn, by ſpecious pretences, into their own deſtruction.”

The affairs on the continent, relative to the tranquillity of England, may be comprized in a very little compaſs. The death of Auguſtus II. king of Poland, which happened on the fifth of February, occaſioned a dreadful ſcene of war in Europe. Staniſlaus, father-in-law to the French king, and the elector of Saxony, ſon to the deceaſed king, were candidates for the Poliſh ſceptre. The former was ſupported by France, and the latter by the emperor, the czarina, and the king of Pruſſia. England could not declare herſelf without the concurrence of the united provinces; and that cautious republic ſhewed a viſible reluctance to launch into an expenſive and ruinous war, merely for the ſake of ſupporting the emperor's quarrel. In vain did the emperor's miniſters ſollicit, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, both at the court of London and at the Hague, to take the moſt ſpeedy and vigorous meaſures to prevent their ally from being cruſhed by the power of his enemies, and the balance of power in Europe thereby utterly deſtroyed.

A. D. 1734. Such was the ſtate of affairs when the parliament met on the ſeventeenth of January; and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty, among other particulars, told the two houſes, "That though he was no way concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle ſpectator of the preſent events, or be indifferent about the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful confederacy; that he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers which were more immediately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, eſpecially with the ſtates-general of the united provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought moſt adviſeable for the common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe: that he would order the eſtimates to be laid before them, of ſuch ſervices as demanded their preſent and immediate care: that the augmentation that would be propoſed for the ſea-ſervice, would be very conſiderable; but he was confident they would think it reaſonable and neceſſary: that he moſt particularly recommended to their care the debt of the navy, which had been every year laid before them; but, from the preſent circumſtances of the times, he believed they would be perſuaded that he now required ſome proviſion to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer poſtponed, without manifeſt detriment to the public ſervice: that, as theſe extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raiſe the ſupplies neceſſary for defraying them, with that readineſs and diſpatch, and with that juſt regard to the true intereſt of his people, which this parliament had hitherto ſhewn upon all occaſions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch expedition in the public buſineſs, as might give him the ſooner opportunity of conſulting a new parliament: that he flattered himſelf his preſent reſolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and whatever inſinuations might be thrown out againſt the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundleſs jealouſies, and make it appear, that Great-Britain ought always to act that part which the honour and intereſt of the nation called upon it to undertake."

This ſpeech cauſed a violent debate in the houſe of commons, though it muſt be owned, without any neceſſity, there was nothing in the ſpeech exceptionable. The miniſterial party, however, prevailed, and an addreſs of thanks was voted to his majeſty. Several other topics that came before the houſe, occaſioned very warm debates, in which the ſpeeches generally abounded with perſonal ſatire, and often with very indecent reflections. But the ſubject that gave occaſion to the moſt violent debates between the two parties, was a motion made by Mr. Bromley for repealing the act for ſeptennial parliaments.

In ſupport of this motion, he alledged, that the reaſons for prolonging the ſitting of parliament from three to ſeven years, were now at an end: that the people in general looked upon ſeptennial parliaments as a grievance and innovation in the conſtitution: that he begged leave to remind the houſe of the act made in the ſixteenth of Charles II. which wiſely provided againſt the too long continuance of one and the ſame parliament, by ordaining that a new parliament ſhould be called once in three years, and oftener, if need required: that this act was expreſsly confirmed by the bill of rights: that from the time of the revolution to the firſt year of the late king, no parliament had ſat above three years, and ſome only one ſeſſion: that he thought triennial parliaments were more grievous than annual ones, and conſequently ſeptennial parliaments muſt be doubly more grievous than thoſe which laſted only three years! that ſuppoſing he ſhould be miſtaken in this point, which, nevertheleſs, he could never admit without due conviction, the argument in the preamble to the ſeptennial bill was altogether inapplicable to the preſent times: that the act againſt bribery and corruption would neceſſarily remedy that evil, as it would prevent corruption in the elections; but nothing but the frequent returns of new parliaments could prevent it in the elected. In order, therefore, to effect this deſireable purpoſe, he moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill for repealing the ſeptennial, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments.

Sir John Aubin, knight of the ſhire for Cornwall, ſeconded Mr. Bromley. In his ſpeech upon this occaſion, he gave a kind of detail of the duration of parliaments from the time of Henry VIII. ſhewed how triennial parliaments came to be ſecured at the revolution, and how they came to be loſt again to the nation when the ſeptennial act took place. He was next at ſome pains to prove, that ſeptennial parliaments are moſt proper for the purpoſes of a wicked miniſtry; but that the more frequent parliaments are, they are the more ſalutary both for the king and people; and, at the ſame time, throughout his whole ſpeech, he complained greatly of the increaſing influence of the crown. He was anſwered by Mr. Conduit, a relation of the great Sir Iſaac Newton. He endeavoured to ſhew, from Prynne's writings, that the prerogatives of the kings of England, and the liberties of the people, are very different from what they were in former days. He took notice, that the heavy complaints againſt Charles I. and his ſon James II. did not ariſe from continuing the ſame parliament too long, but for not calling, or not holding any parliament at all. He thought that miniſters could more eaſily manage a triennial than a ſeptennial parliament; and confirmed his obſervations by ſaying, that in ſeptennial parliaments it has been ſeen, that a ſmall minority againſt the miniſter at the beginning of the parliament, has often increaſed greatly, and even nearly to an equality before the end. He thought that the diſpoſal of poſts and places rather weakened than ſtrengthened the crown; becauſe every place having three or four candidates for it, when one only can ſucceed, the diſappointed candidates immediately become enemies to the court. He maintained, that the reaſons for paſſing the ſeptennial act ſtill exiſted; that one of the reaſons was a ſpirit of jacobitiſm prevailing when the ſeptennial act paſſed; and he thought that the great diſcontent that had lately appeared in the nation, had a conſiderable mixture of jacobitiſm in their compoſition.

The next who ſpoke was Sir Thomas Robinſon, who maintained, that the expence of chuſing triennial parliaments muſt fall far heavier upon the public than that of chuſing ſeptennial ones. He obſerved, that during the twenty-two years, while triennial parliaments continued, they were found to be attended with great inconveniencies; whereas, during the eighteen years in which ſeptennial parliaments had continued, many excellent laws had paſſed, and many wiſe inſtitutions had been formed for the good of the people. He took notice, that when gentlemen ſpeak of the whole conſtitution of England, they ſpeak in very vague terms; becauſe the conſtitution of England was never fixed till the time of the revolution. He next examined the ſtate of parliaments under the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. and maintained, that in the longeſt parliament that ever ſat in England, which happened under the latter, the longer they ſat, they were more and more averſe to the meaſures of the crown, notwithſtanding all the power of corruption employed to ſeduce them; and therefore, by parity of reaſoning, ſeptennial parliaments are more favourable to public liberty than triennial ones. In ſhort, he thought, that a deſire to revert back to the practice of remote antiquity in that reſpect, might be compared to a man in his full growth and ſtrength, deſiring to return back to his childhood. He obſerved, that if antiquity was to be the only rule, a ſeſſion of parliament ought ſeldom or never to continue above twenty days; for parliaments, in former times, had not buſineſs ſufficient to keep them any longer ſitting: but, in fact, the whole form of the conſtitution has been ſince altered, by the alterations that have, from time to time, happened in the modes of property and the multiplication of buſineſs, through the increaſe of agriculture, arts, manufactures and commerce. He affirmed, that ſhould the motion be agreed to, it muſt have a very bad effect upon all foreign negotiations, becauſe foreign miniſters, in their negotiations with Great-Britain, and alſo with other courts, are chiefly determined by the ſentiments of a Britiſh parliament: but ſhould they have thoſe to conſult anew every three years, they would not be able to know how to determine with regard to many great and important points.

Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who had acquired great experience in elections for members of parliament, ſpoke ſtrongly for the queſtion. He inſiſted upon it, that a man who could get a hundred guineas for his vote for a ſeptennial parliament, would not get fifteen for a triennial one; and that bribery and corruption are the natural conſequences of long parliaments. He was anſwered by Sir John Willes, attorney-general. He obſerved, that if any time was to be fixed upon for imitating the old conſtitution with regard to parliaments, "we are not ſurely," ſaid he, "to take the time when our conſtitution was weak, and in its infancy; we certainly ſhould chuſe that time, when it had reached its full ſtrength and vigour, which, in my opinion, is the preſent. But as gentlemen have mentioned the bill of rights, let us examine how it ſtood at that time; for I am perſuaded it will be agreed to by every gentleman in this houſe, that after that claim was ſettled and confirmed, our conſtitution has been more vigorous than it ever was before that time; and yet, even in this claim of rights, there is no mention made of frequent new parliaments: it is, indeed, ſaid, that, for the redreſs of grievances, and for amending, ſtrengthening and preſerving the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently; but it is not ſo much as inſinuated, that every one of theſe ought to be a new parliament: and as to the frequency of parliaments, I am ſure there never was leſs reaſon for complaints than ſince the ſeptennial bill paſſed; for, ever ſince that time, the ſeſſions have been regularly held, and all of them been allowed to ſit as long as it was neceſſary or proper they ſhould. He then obſerved, that the triennial act itſelf was not obtained upon principles of liberty, but in order to diſtreſs king William, and the friends to the revolution. He was of opinion, that the tranſition of the conſtitution from triennial to ſeptennial parliaments, was, in itſelf, a right meaſure, and agreeable to the true principles of Engliſh government, independent of any temporary conſideration. He maintained, that it was owing to the inconveniencies of triennial parliaments, that king William was obliged to make ſo bad a peace with France, when he might have carried on the war in ſo advantageous a manner for the liberties of Europe.

In anſwer to the objection, that the elected, during a long parliament, are apt to forget their dependence upon their conſtituents, which could not be the caſe if parliaments were annual, he made the following obſervations: "That we have all a dependence upon the people for our election, is what I readily grant; but after we are choſen, and have taken our ſeats in this houſe, we have no longer any dependence on our electors, at leaſt ſo far as regards our behaviour here. Their whole power is then devolved upon us; and we are, in every queſtion that comes before this houſe, to regard only the public good in general, and to determine according to our own judgments: if we do not, if we depend upon our conſtituents, and follow blindly the inſtructions they ſend us, we cannot be ſaid to act freely, nor can ſuch parliaments be called free parliaments; ſuch a dependence would be a moſt dangerous dependence; it would, in my opinion, be more dangerous, and of worſe conſequence, than a dependence upon the crown; for in a dependence upon the crown I can ſee no danger, as long as the intereſt of the crown is made the ſame with that of the people, which every man muſt allow to be the caſe at preſent: whereas the people of any county, city, or borough, are very liable to be miſled, and may often be induced to give inſtructions directly contrary to the true intereſt of their country."

Sir John Barnard attacked this doctrine with all his power. "A learned and honourable gentleman" ſaid he, "has advanced a doctrine which I think altogether new; that we are to have no farther dependence on our electors, after we have taken our ſeats in this houſe; nay, that a dependence on them would be more dangerous than a dependence on the crown. This, Sir, is really, in my opinion, ſomething very new. Though that gentleman may, perhaps, like the one better than the other, yet I ſhall always look upon a dependence on the people of England, or even on thoſe I repreſent, to be leſs dangerous, and more honourable, than a dependence on the crown; and I value myſelf more on the honour I have received in ſitting here for two parliaments, as one of the repreſentatives of the people of England, and by the free and uncorrupted choice of thoſe I repreſent, than I ſhould on the greateſt honours the crown can beſtow. If, indeed, I had obtained my ſeat here by bribery, or the illegal and corrupt influence of any corrupt miniſter, I ſhould look upon it in a very different light; I ſhould look upon it as one of the moſt diſgraceful ſituations I could be in."

Sir William Yonge replied to theſe remarks of Sir John Barnard. "My learned friend" ſaid he, "happened to make an obſervation, which I ſtill think a very juſt one. He ſaid, that after we were returned, and had taken our ſeats in this houſe, we ought not any longer to have a dependence on thoſe we repreſent. This the honourable gentleman laid hold of. He not only called it a new and very extraordinary doctrine, but dropt an expreſſion, ſuch as I think ought not to be made uſe of in this houſe. As to the obſervation made by my learned friend, he certainly meant, and I believe almoſt every gentleman underſtood him, that after we had taken our ſeats in this houſe, we ought every one of us to look upon ourſelves as one of the repreſentatives of the whole body of the commons of England, and ought not to have any particular bias for the county, city, or borough, we repreſent. This, Sir, is ſo far from being a doctrine very extraordinary, or altogether new, that I wiſh every gentleman in this houſe would make it a ſtanding rule for his conduct; for I cannot help obſerving, that there are ſome in this aſſembly, who, on many occaſions, confine their thoughts too much to the particular county, city, or borough they repreſent; but ſurely they muſt be ſenſible, that many things may happen in parliament which may be for the intereſt of the nation in general, though they may not, perhaps, quadrate ſo exactly with the particular intereſt of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, or other particular places; and, in ſuch a caſe, the gentleman himſelf muſt ſurely grant, that, as members of this houſe, they ought to drop, not only their dependence upon, but even their concern for the particular city they repreſent, in order to concur with the reſt of the members of this houſe, in what they judge to be for the general intereſt of the nation."

Several other ſpeeches were made on this intereſting motion; but when the queſtion was put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of two hundred and forty-ſeven againſt one hundred and eighty-four.

On the fourteenth of March, the nuptial ceremony between the prince of Orange and the princeſs-royal of England was performed with great pomp; and ſome days were ſpent in the warmeſt congratulations from both houſes of parliament, the city of London, and other public bodies, upon the marriage.

The buſineſs before the parliament being completed, the king came to the houſe of peers on the ſixteenth of April, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he "congratulated the two houſes on their unanimity, and upon the meaſures that had been taken for reducing the navy debt, which, he ſaid, had been unavoidably incurred, and bore a higher intereſt than the national debt." He then proceeded, in a moſt pathetic manner, to recommend unanimity to his people, and requeſted the members to uſe their beſt endeavours to heal the unhappy diviſions of the kingdom. "It would" added he, "be the greateſt ſatisfaction to me, to ſee a perfect harmony reſtored among them that have one and the ſame principle at heart; that there might be no diſtinction but of ſuch as mean the ſupport of our preſent conſtitution in church and ſtate, and ſuch as wiſh to ſubvert both. This is the only diſtinction that ought to prevail in this country, where the intereſt of king and people is one and the ſame, and where they cannot ſubſiſt but by being ſo. If religion, liberty, and property, were never at any time more fully enjoyed, without not only an attempt, but even the ſhadow of a deſign, to alter or invade them, let not theſe ſacred names be made uſe of as artful and plauſible pretences to undermine the preſent eſtabliſhment, under which alone they can be ſafe.

"I have nothing to wiſh, but that my people may not be miſguided: I appeal to their own conſciences for my conduct, and hope the providence of God will direct them in the choice of ſuch repreſentatives as are moſt fit to be truſted with the care and preſervation of the proteſtant religion, the preſent eſtabliſhment, and all the religious and civil rights of Great-Britain."

Soon after the riſing of the parliament, it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new one. The whole nation was immediately thrown into a ferment, and every means made uſe of to influence the electors in their choice of repreſentatives. The power of the miniſtry, however, prevailed; and the elections, in moſt parts of the kingdom, were carried in favour of the court.

During theſe tranſactions in England, Staniſlaus had been elected to fill the throne of Poland; but the oppoſition againſt him was too powerful for him to withſtand. He retired to Dantzick, where the inhabitants promiſed to defend him at all events. He had no ſooner left the capital, than the other party proceeded to a new election, and Auguſtus was now placed on the Poliſh throne. The Ruſſian army then advanced againſt Dantzick, and laid great part of the city in aſhes. Staniſlaus, who felt more for the miſery of his friends than for his own, determined not to perſevere in a defence which muſt be attended with the deſtruction of the whole city. He accordingly made his eſcape from Dantzick in a very wonderful manner, and the city immediately opened her gates to the Ruſſian army, and peace was reſtored, on the inhabitants acknowledging the right of king Auguſtus to the crown of Poland.

The war in Italy was carried on with great ſucceſs againſt the emperor. Two very bloody battles were fought at Parma and Guaſtalla with doubtful ſucceſs. Don Carlos took poſſeſſion of Naples and Sicily, and was placed upon the Neapolitan throne. Nor was any thing omitted by the Engliſh miniſtry for putting the kingdom in a poſture of defence, as the conduct of ſome of the allies was very doubtful. The court of Spain ſuffered the eldeſt ſon of the pretender to ſerve in the army of Don Carlos, by whom he was treated with diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect. That prince even made no ſcruple of declaring publicly, that whenever the ſituation of his affairs would permit, he would ſupport the intereſt of the abdicated family with all his power.

A. D. 1735. The new parliament met at Weſtminſter on the twenty-third of January, and was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty informed the two houſes, That having undertaken, in concert with the ſtates-general, to mediate between the belligerent powers, he had met with ſo much ſucceſs, that a plan would ſpeedily be offered to the conſideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a baſis for a negotiation for a general peace. He alſo acquainted them, that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark; a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the preſent conjuncture; and which, being attended with ſome expence, he would order it to be ſubmitted to the conſideration of the commons. At the ſame time, he put them in mind, that while a war was raging in Europe, it would be proper, at all events, though it might be attended with ſome expence, for Great-Britain to keep her forces on a reſpectable footing.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion, the mutiny-bill received a very material alteration. In all the preceding acts, the juſtice of peace had it in his power to commit a poor fellow to priſon, if, after receiving the inliſting money, he refuſed to take the oaths, even though he offered to return the money: but a clauſe was now inſerted, importing, that every officer who ſhould hereafter inliſt any man to ſerve in any regiment, ſhould, within a certain number of days, carry the perſon inliſted before one of the next juſtices of the peace, where the man ſhould be at liberty to declare his diſſent to ſuch an act, and his having repented of what he had done; and upon his doing this, and returning the officer the inliſting money, and paying the expences incurred in the progreſs of the affair, ſuch juſtice ſhould forthwith diſcharge him; and that an officer guilty of any failure or neglect in this particular, ſhould be liable to the ſame penalties as are inflicted on thoſe who ſhould be guilty of falſe muſters.

But an affair of a much more ſerious nature was now before the commons. The magiſtrates of the royal burgh of Haddington had been ſeized and confined in a diſtant priſon, without the benefit of being admitted to bail, by a warrant from one of the Scottiſh judges. Another judge, however, had ventured to take bail, and ſet them at liberty. The injured party preſented a petition to the houſe of commons; and the caſe appeared ſo flagrant, that a motion was made to refer it to the conſideration of a committee of the whole houſe. This was, however, oppoſed by the miniſter and his friends, from what motive is hard to ſay; and the motion was rejected.

Another incident that had happened in Scotland, greatly engaged the attention of parliament. This was a petition to the houſe of lords, ſubſcribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queenſbury, and Montroſe, by the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair; repreſenting, that undue influence had been uſed in carrying on the election of the ſixteen peers of Scotland.

A day was appointed for taking this petition into conſideration; but the houſe ſeemed divided with regard to the manner in which they ought to proceed in this delicate and intereſting affair. The duke of Newcaſtle obſerved, that it was doubtful whether the houſe had even the power of receiving ſuch a petition, there being nothing in the articles of union that gave a Britiſh houſe of lords a right to interfere in the election of the Scottiſh peers; nor indeed had they otherwiſe any ſuch right, unleſs ſome particular charge was ſtated, and offered to be proved. On the other hand, the party that ſupported the petition urged, that it was general; that the facts contained in it were of a very dangerous complexion, and ſuch as ought to be puniſhed if they were proved. But as the real deſign of the petition ſeemed to be uncertain, it was agreed that the conſideration ſhould be adjourned for a little time, during which the petitioners ſhould be ordered to declare, "Whether they intended to controvert the election of the ſixteen peers, or the election of any, and which of them?"

This order being communicated by the lord chancellor to the petitioners, they, in a few days, delivered in a declaration, importing, "that they did not intend to oppoſe either the election, or return of the ſixteen Scottiſh peers; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordſhips the evidence of ſuch facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the conſtitution, and might, in future elections, equally affect the right of the preſent ſixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not timely prevented by a proper remedy."

When this declaration was read in the houſe, it was objected to by the court party, as unſatisfactory. The duke of Devonſhire therefore made a motion, "That the petitioners ſhould be ordered to lay before the houſe, in writing, inſtances of thoſe undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and alſo the names of the perſons they ſuſpected to be guilty." This motion was warmly oppoſed by the earls of Cheſterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, and the lords Bathurſt and Carteret. Lord Cheſterfield concluded his ſpeech on this occaſion with the following remarkable expreſſions. "Suppoſing, my lords, we ſhould get information that ſeveral barrels of gunpowder had been placed under this houſe, in order to blow us up; would it not be very fooliſh to delay going to ſearch for and remove the gunpowder, till we ſhould be informed by what means, at what time, and by whom the powder was placed there? The caſe before us is the very ſame: there is a ſort of metaphorical gunpowder placed under this houſe, which will, in time, blow us up, if it be not removed; and, in ſuch a caſe, are we to trifle away our time in inquiries after the names of the perſons who placed it there, and the methods by which it was conveyed?" However beautiful and expreſſive this compariſon might be, it produced not the deſired effect; like the reaſonings of the other lords, it was overcome by the majority, who voted the declaration unſatisfactory; and the petitioners were ordered, in eight days, to lay their complaints before the houſe in writing.

Accordingly the petitioning noblemen preſented a remonſtrance to the lords on the day appointed, in which they obſerved, "That as they had no intention to become accuſers, they could not take upon them to name particular perſons, who might have been concerned in thoſe illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordſhips, upon their taking the proper examination: that, nevertheleſs, they begged leave to acquaint their lordſhips, that the petition was laid before them upon information that the liſt of the ſixteen peers for Scotland had been framed previous to the election, by perſons in high truſt under the crown: that this liſt was ſhewn to the peers, as a liſt approved by the crown, and was called the king's liſt, from which there was to be no variation, unleſs to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition of their conforming to certain meaſures: that peers were ſollicited to vote for this liſt, without the liberty of making any alteration: that endeavours were uſed to engage their ſuffrages for this liſt by the promiſe of penſions and offices, civil and military, to themſelves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that ſums of money were actually given for this purpoſe: that penſions, offices, and releaſes of debts owing to the crown, were granted to peers who concurred in voting for this liſt, and to their relations: that on the day of election, a battalion of his majeſty's troops was drawn up in the Abbey-court, contrary to cuſtom, and without any other apparent cauſe than that of over-awing the electors: that theſe inſtances of undue practices would, they hoped, be abundantly ſufficient to ſatisfy their lordſhips, that they had juſt cauſe to pray the houſe to take this matter into their ſerious conſideration, and to provide ſuch remedy as might be effectual for preſerving the right and freedom of elections; ſuch right of electing being the only right that now remained with the peers of Scotland, in lieu of a conſtant and hereditary ſeat in parliament."

The reading of this remonſtrance gave riſe to another warm debate. The holding under arms a battalion of ſoldiers was repreſented as a moſt ſcandalous, arbitrary, and flagrant infringement of the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and of that independency that ſhould ever be preſerved in all elections. The fact was acknowledged by the oppoſite party; but it was alledged that ſuch a ſtep was at once both legal and prudent: that the ſoldiers were drawn out by the authority of the civil magiſtrate, in order to prevent riots and tumults among the populace, who had been inflamed by the oppoſite party to a pitch of reſentment that threatened the moſt fatal conſequences, if not timely ſuppreſſed. Theſe reaſons prevailed with the majority, the petition was voted unſatisfactory, and the whole affair laid aſide.

The ſupplies being granted, and the other buſineſs of the ſeſſion completed, the ſeſſion was cloſed on the fifteenth of May by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty was pleaſed to acknowledge, that the plan of pacification he had formed with the ſtates-general had not yet proved effectual; but added, that he was ſtill determined to perſiſt in the ſame pacific meaſures, and to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to compoſe the troubles of Europe. He thanked the parliament for the power they had given him to augment his forces by ſea and land; acquainted them with his intention to viſit his German dominions, and that he ſhould conſtitute the queen regent during his abſence.

The affairs of Europe were, at this juncture, in a delicate and critical ſituation. The emperor complained loudly of the pacific and puſillanimous meaſures of the Engliſh court, which, from the treaties ſtill ſubſiſting between Great-Britain and the empire, he expected would have eſpouſed his cauſe. In the mean time, the belligerent powers grew heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to acknowledge their real ſentiments. At laſt an armiſtice took place between the emperor and France, which gave occaſion to ſome preliminary articles, by which the latter offered to reſtore to the empire all the places ſhe had taken during the war. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the Mantuan, Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneſe. Don Carlos was to be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily; the dutchy of Tuſcany was aſſigned to the duke of Lorrain, who afterwards married Maria-Thereſa, eldeſt daughter to the emperor: the dutchy of Lorrain was annexed to the crown of France, and the dutchy of Bar given to Staniſlaus, king of Poland, who renounced that crown, but was to enjoy the title. By this plan of pacification, Leghorn was to be declared a free port; France was to guaranty the pragmatic ſanction; and England, Holland, Portugal and Vienna, were to be ſollicited to guaranty the preſent treaty, to which the kings of Spain and Sardinia were to be invited to accede.

A. D. 1736. The parliament met on the fifteenth of January, when it appeared, by his majeſty's ſpeech, that the plan of pacification between the French and imperial courts was nearly the ſame with that which had been concerted between him and the ſtates-general, though communicated as a new plan formed by the principal contracting powers. He told both houſes of parliament, "That he had agreed to the plan which had been communicated to the kings of Spain and Sardinia; and there were hopes of their agreeing to it, upon their obtaining reaſonable ſecurity for their poſſeſſing the countries ſtipulated to them." His majeſty added, "That he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces both by ſea and land; but hoped they would agree to ſome extraordinary expence, till the peace of Europe was more fully ſettled;" and concluded with pathetically exhorting them, in imitation of the great powers of Europe, to peace and unanimity.

The ſupplies were voted without any remarkable debate; but a ſubject of the greateſt importance to the ſafety of the nation ſoon after engaged the attention of parliament. The drinking of geneva, and other diſtilled ſpirituous liquors, had, for ſome years paſt, encreaſed to a ſurprizing degree, eſpecially among the lower claſs of people, of whom thouſands had already periſhed by this abominable practice, and a much greater number were rendered wholly unfit for labour or ſervice. At the ſame time their morals had been ſo greatly debauched, that a general diſſoluteneſs had taken place among them. Theſe pernicious liquors, of which gin was principally drank, were not only ſold by diſtillers, but retailed in the ſmalleſt quantities in every petty chandler's ſhop and coal-ſhed, in the metropolis; by which means, journeymen, apprentices, and ſervants, were drawn in to intoxicate themſelves with this bewitching fluid. In ſhort, there was the greateſt reaſon to apprehend, that the public welfare and ſafety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by this practice, which was ſo dangerous to the health, ſtrength, peace and morals, and even threatened the total extinction of the lower claſs of people. Induced by theſe melancholy conſiderations, the magiſtrates of Middleſex preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, in which they enumerated theſe evils, and prayed the houſe to take the matter into their ſerious conſideration, and apply ſuch remedy as they ſhould think proper.

After a thorough examination of this affair, a motion was made for levying a duty of two ſhillings per gallon upon all ſpiritous liquors, and that fifty ſhillings ſhould be paid to his majeſty for a licence, to be taken out yearly by every perſon who ſhould ſell any of whatever kind.

This occaſioned a very warm debate. It was ſaid, that theſe duties amounted to a prohibition; and as this extended to rum, there was great reaſon to fear that it would prove of fatal conſequence to the Britiſh ſugar iſlands, which were already in a declining condition: that many thouſands depended for their livelihood on the Britiſh diſtillery; and that it was highly abſurd to argue againſt the uſe of a thing from the abuſe of it.

To this it was anſwered, that nothing but the extreme danger of the nation, from the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, could have induced them to make ſuch a motion: that they were fully ſenſible of the difficulties to which great numbers of his majeſty's ſubjects would be reduced by the duties propoſed to be laid on ſuch liquors; but that the intereſt of individuals ought to give way to the general intereſt; and where the preſervation of the community was viſibly and ſo eſſentially concerned, the hardſhips of ſome few individuals muſt be overlooked: that with reſpect to rum and brandy, it was very certain thoſe liquors had often been drank to very great exceſs, notwithſtanding the high duties laid upon them, and were as pernicious both to the health and morals of the people as any home made ſpirit: that if any ſorts of ſpirits were exempted from the duties now propoſed, the retailer would ſell the moſt pernicious ſtuff under that denomination; and the diſtiller would compound them in ſuch a manner, that it would be impoſſible to detect the impoſition. Theſe reaſons were thought ſufficient by the majority, and a bill was ordered in for impoſing the above duties.

While this bill was depending ſeveral petitions were preſented to the houſe by the planters in the the ſugar colonies, and the merchants of Briſtol and Liverpool, repreſenting the hardſhips to which they ſhould be expoſed, by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and ſpirits diſtilled from molaſſes. Theſe applications occaſioned a mitigating clauſe in favour of a compoſition known by the name of punch; and the diſtillers were permitted to exerciſe any other employment.

On the twenty-ſeventh of April his royal highneſs Frederic, prince of Wales, was married to the princeſs Auguſta of Saxe-Gotha. This event filled the nation with joy. The two houſes of parliament, the city of London, and almoſt every county-town and borough in England, expreſſed their ſatisfaction in addreſſes to their majeſties, and the prince and princeſs of Wales.

Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion was one for reſtraining lands from being diſpoſed of in Mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. This bill took its riſe from ſeveral incidents that had lately happened; by which heirs at law had ſuffered conſiderably by injudicious diſpoſals of their lands to charitable and other uſes: it was therefore thought proper to put a ſtop to ſo growing an evil. This bill alarmed the two univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, and they, as well as the colleges of Eaton, Wincheſter and Weſtminſter, preſented petitions againſt it. The petition from the univerſity of Cambridge was very particular, ſetting forth, "That the univerſity and the colleges in it, were founded and endowed for the maintaining fit perſons, in the ſtudy of uſeful knowledge, and to bring up youth in learning, virtue and religion; that in general the intention of the founders had been anſwered. But the petitioners apprehended, that if the bill now depending paſſed without amendment, it would be attended both in the preſent and in futurity, with very prejudicial conſequences, becauſe it would cut them off from donations to ſupply preſent and future deficiencies, or for any other wiſe or great purpoſes, how uſeful or neceſſary ſoever they might be thought; and that a conſiderable part of their revenue aroſe from annuities and other certain payments, iſſuing out of lands and other eſtates, and that many of thoſe payments having been fixed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and ſtill continuing invariably the ſame, were then by the great fall of money ſince that time, ſunk ſo far below their original value, as to be inſufficient to anſwer the purpoſes to which they were deſigned; and that ſeveral headſhips were under one hundred and twenty pounds, ſome under a hundred a year, and that the ſalary of ſome profeſſorſhips were under fifty pounds a year; and others, as thoſe of botany, anatomy, and chemiſtry had no endowment at all; and that the income of much the greater part of their fellowſhips was under ſixty pounds, of many under forty pounds, of ſome ſo low as thirty, twenty, and fifteen pounds a year; and that many of their ſcholarſhips and exhibitions were even under thoſe ſmall ſums, and that many poor ſtudents had neither ſcholarſhip, nor exhibition to help towards their maintenance; and that the number of advowſons in moſt colleges was very ſmall in proportion to the number of fellows; and therefore praying the houſe to except that univerſity and the ſeveral colleges therein out of the ſaid bill."

The requeſt of all theſe ſeats of learning was complied with; but the petitions of the hoſpitals, and other charitable ſocieties were rejected. Several other amendments were alſo made to the bill both in the lower and upper houſe; after which it paſſed, and received the royal aſſent.

In this ſeſſion of parliament the bill for building a bridge croſs the river Thames from New Palace yard to the oppoſite ſhore in the county of Surry, was paſſed into a law. And the ſtructure is now one of the nobleſt pieces of architecture in any part of the world.

On the twentieth of May his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament by a ſpeech, in which he acquainted both houſes, "That ſince the preliminary articles had been concluded between his moſt chriſtian majeſty and the emperor, a farther convention concerning the execution of them had been made and communicated to him by both thoſe courts; and that negotiations were carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle the general pacification." His majeſty then expreſſed his concern with relation to the ſeeds of diſſention that had been ſown among his people; exhorted his parliament to cultivate unanimity, and promiſed impartial protection to all his ſubjects. He then acquainted them, "that being obliged that ſummer to viſit his German dominions, he hoped they would make the adminiſtration of the queen, whom he had reſolved to appoint regent in his abſence, as eaſy to her, as her wiſe conduct would render her government agreeable to them."

A tumult was expected to be the conſequence of the gin act's taking place, eſpecially as the common people had lately ſufficiently ſhewn their diſpoſition for riot and diſorder. The guards were, therefore, doubled at Kenſington, St. James's and Whitehall; a detachment of the life-guards and horſe grenadiers patrolled Covent-garden, and places adjacent; but contrary to expectation, every thing remained very quiet, and the act took place without the leaſt diſorder.

About the middle of April an incident happened in Scotland, which was attended with very ſerious conſequences. One Wilſon, a bold, reſolute fellow, had been tried and condemned to be hanged at Edinburgh, for robbing one of the officers of the revenue; and for having afterwards been guilty of one of the moſt daring actions ever attempted, that of reſcuing out of the hands of juſtice his brother-convict in the time of divine ſervice, when ſurrounded by his guards. So deſperate an offender filled the city of Edinburgh with terror, and the magiſtrates redoubled their uſual precautions for cauſing the ſentence pronounced againſt this deſperate criminal to be executed. This had the deſired effect, and Wilſon ſuffered without any diſturbance being raiſed by his friends; but while the executioner was cutting him down from the gallows, he was pelted with dirt and ſtones by the rabble. Some of the ſtones happening to ſtrike Porteous, who commanded the city guards, he gave way to his brutal paſſion, and ordered his ſoldiers to fire among the populace. They readily obeyed, and ſeveral perſons were killed, and others wounded. As this was done without any order from the magiſtrates, Porteous was tried for murder, convicted on full evidence, and ſentenced to be hanged on the eighth of September. The jury, however, by whom he was tried, found in their verdict, "that he and his guards had been attacked and pelted with ſtones of a conſiderable ſize, thrown by the multitude, whereby ſeveral of the ſoldiers were bruiſed and wounded."

This paliating circumſtance, together with the daring inſolence of the ſmugglers, of whom Wilſon was the chief, and who were then very numerous at Edinburgh, induced the queen, who was then regent, to indulge Porteous with a reſpite for ſix weeks, that a more particular enquiry might be made into the whole tranſaction. This reſpite occaſioned a very tragical cataſtrophe. The common people reſented in the moſt outrageous manner, this lenity ſhewn to a perſon who was the object of their deteſtation: they conſidered it as an attempt to ſanctify oppreſſion. The relations and friends of thoſe who had been killed, took every method in their power to increaſe this hatred in the populace; and a reſolution was formed to execute the criminal, and on the very day fixed by the judges for that purpoſe. Accordingly, about ten o'clock at night, on the ſeventh of September, a party of men from the adjacent country, entered Edinburgh, ſurprized the city guard, ſeized all their fire arms, locked up the gates, and gave the alarm that they were come to revenge innocent blood. They were immediately joined by ſeveral thouſands the populace, and repaired directly to the priſon where Porteous was confined. After ſeveral fruitleſs attempts to force open the door, they ſet it on fire, dragged the criminal from his apartment, and hanged him upon a dyer's pole near the graſs-market. From the boldneſs, ſecrecy and ſucceſs of this daring enterprize, it was univerſally believed, that ſome perſons, much above the rank of the vulgar, were concerned in it; eſpecially as they left the arms and drums of the city guard on the ſpot where they found them, as ſoon as the execution was over, and departed quietly without offering the leaſt violence to any other perſon.

The queen highly reſented this inſult offered to the government; and on enquiring it appeared, that the magiſtrates of Edinburgh had received intimation the day before of what was to happen, but had neglected to take the neceſſary precautions to render the attempt abortive. Her majeſty complained of this want of reſpect to her government, and a reſolution was taken to make a ſtrict enquiry into the whole proceeding, and to puniſh the guilty with the utmoſt ſeverity.

A. D. 1737. The parliament met at Weſtminſter on the firſt of February, and the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion from his majeſty. The lord-chancellor acquainted both houſes, that a farther convention with regard to the execution of the preliminary articles had been communicated to his majeſty by the French and Imperial courts, and that negotiations were then carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle a general pacification. He added, "That the reſpective acts of ceſſion being exchanged, and orders iſſued for the evacuation and poſſeſſion of the ſeveral countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and diſpoſition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity was greatly advanced. But that his majeſty was of opinion, that great attention ought to be paid to the final concluſion of the new ſettlement which was to diſpoſe of ſuch conſiderable parts of Europe. That though there was the moſt promiſing appearance of a general and laſting tranquillity, yet common prudence called upon the Britiſh nation to avoid an indolent ſecurity and too great a diſregard to future events. In ſhort, that ſhe might be provided againſt all attempts that might be made againſt her peace by her enemies." He next acquainted the commons, "That his majeſty had, as ſoon as circumſtances would admit, made ſuch a reduction of the expences, as was conſiſtent with the peace and ſafety of his kingdoms, the ſecurity of commerce, and the honour and intereſt of the nation." In the remainder of the ſpeech, the late diſturbance at Edinburgh was mentioned in the following manner. "His majeſty cannot but obſerve, that it muſt be matter of the utmoſt ſurprize and concern to every true lover of his country, to ſee the many contrivances and attempts carried on in various ſhapes, and in various parts of the nation, tumultuouſly to reſiſt and obſtruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom. The diſturbers of the public repoſe, conſcious that the intereſt of his majeſty and his people are the ſame, and of the good harmony which ſubſiſts between him and his parliament, have levelled their ſedition againſt both, and, in their late outrages, have either directly oppoſed, or, at leaſt, attempted to render ineffectual, ſome acts of the whole legiſlature. His majeſty, in his great wiſdom, thinks it affords a melancholy proſpect to conſider to what height thoſe audacious proceedings may riſe."

This ſpeech was anſwered by very loyal addreſſes from both houſes of parliament. The lords, as forming the ſupreme court of judicature in the kingdom, took particular notice of that part of his majeſty's ſpeech, relating to tumults and riots. Lord Carteret obſerved, that notwithſtanding the power with which the civil magiſtrate was inveſted, the military force had been employed in ſupporting the late diſturbances, none of which, he ſaid, had proceeded from any diſaffection to the government, but from very different cauſes. He repreſented the murder which had been committed by the populace of Edinburgh, as a crime of the moſt attrocious nature; adding, that the conſpiracy by which it had been effected was the more alarming, as it had not been attended with any of thoſe diſorders ſo common to the tumults of a headſtrong and riotous populace; which afforded the greateſt reaſon to believe, that it had been framed and conducted by perſons of rank and conſequence. His lordſhip was therefore of opinion, that the houſe ought to make the moſt diligent inquiſition into this affair, in order to diſcover the delinquents, and bring them to condign puniſhment; and even to puniſh the city of Edinburgh, if it ſhould appear that the inhabitants and magiſtrates had not exerted their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs the inſurrection. He then moved, "That the provoſt and baillies of Edinburgh, in the year 1736, the perſon commanding the city guard at the time of the riot, in which captain Porteous was murdered; and the commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in Scotland at the time of the ſaid riot, ſhould all of them be ordered to attend the houſe on a day appointed; and that an humble addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be ſubmitted to their inſpection."

This motion was agreed to; and the gentlemen being arrived from Scotland, the houſe entered, with great alacrity, into the enquiry. The perſons were all ſeparately examined, but their evidence was confuſed and unſatisfactory. The houſe was, however, ſatisfied from the whole, that the magiſtrates of Edinburgh had not done their duty in ſuppreſſing the riot, though they had no legal evidence to convict them. A bill was therefore brought in for diſabling Alexander Wilſon, the provoſt of Edinburgh, from taking, holding, and enjoying any office or place of magiſtracy in that city, or elſewhere in Great-Britain; and for impoſing a fine of two thouſand pounds upon the corporation of Edinburgh, for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. This bill occaſioned very violent debates in both houſes, and was at laſt paſſed by a majority of twenty-ſeven only.

On the twenty-ſecond of February, Mr. Pulteney moved the houſe of commons, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to expreſs the juſt ſenſe of this houſe of his majeſty's great goodneſs and tender regard for the laſting welfare and happineſs of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales; and as this houſe cannot omit any opportunity of ſhewing their zeal and regard for his majeſty's honour, and the proſperity of his family, humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that, in conſideration of the high rank and dignity of their royal highneſſes, the prince and princeſs of Wales, and their many eminent virtues and merits, he would be graciouſly pleaſed to ſettle one hundred thouſand pounds a year on the prince of Wales, out of the revenues chearfully granted to his majeſty, for the expences of his civil government, and better ſupporting the dignity of the crown, and for enabling his majeſty to make an honourable proviſion for his royal family, in the ſame manner his majeſty enjoyed it before his happy acceſſion to the throne: and alſo humbly to beſeech his majeſty to ſettle the like jointure upon her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales, as her majeſty had when ſhe was princeſs of Wales; and to aſſure his majeſty, that this houſe will enable him effectually to perform the ſame, as nothing will more conduce to the ſtrengthening of his majeſty's government, than honourably ſupporting the dignity of his majeſty's government, than honourably ſupporting the dignity of their royal highneſſes, from whom we hope to ſee a numerous iſſue, to deliver down the bleſſings of their reign to the lateſt poſterity."

Sir John Barnard ſeconded this motion, which was ſupported by a great variety of inſtances from the Engliſh hiſtory, in order to prove that the heirs apparent of the crown always had been provided for in a very independent manner.

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that this motion muſt occaſion a breach in the royal family; and, at the ſame time, how greatly his own intereſt was concerned to keep up a good correſpondence with the heir apparent, did every thing in his power to prevent the motion being made in the houſe of commons; but his royal highneſs rejected all terms of accommodation, but ſuch as ſhould be made by parliament. He therefore entered into the debate with great decency and firmneſs, by endeavouring to ſhew, that his majeſty could not, out of his preſent revenue, ſpare a greater allowance, than he did to his royal highneſs: and then he told the houſe,

"That he was commanded by his majeſty to acquaint them, that his majeſty yeſterday ſent a meſſage to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, by the lord chancellor, lord preſident, lord ſteward, lord chamberlain, duke of Richmond, duke of Argyle, duke of Newcaſtle, earl of Pembroke, earl of Scarborough, and lord Harrington." Which meſſage, ſo ſent by thoſe lords, being in writing, was as follows:

"His majeſty has commanded us to acquaint your royal highneſs, in his name, that, upon your royal highneſs's marriage, he immediately took into his royal conſideration the ſettling a proper jointure upon the princeſs of Wales; but his ſudden going abroad, and his indiſpoſition ſince his return, had hitherto retarded the execution of theſe his gracious intentions; from which ſhort delay his majeſty did not apprehend any inconvenience could ariſe, eſpecially ſince no application had in any manner been made to him upon this ſubject by your royal highneſs; and that his majeſty hath now given orders for ſettling a jointure upon the princeſs of Wales, as far as he is enabled by law, ſuitable to her high rank and dignity; which he will, in proper time, lay before his parliament, in order to be rendered certain, and effectually for the benefit of her royal highneſs."

"The king hath farther commanded us to acquaint your royal highneſs, that although your royal highneſs has not thought fit, by any application to his majeſty, to deſire that your allowance of fifty thouſand pounds per annum, which is now paid you by monthly payments, at the choice of your royal highneſs, preferably to quarterly payments, by his majeſty's farther grace and favour, be rendered leſs precarious; his majeſty, to prevent the bad conſequences, which he apprehends may follow from the undutiful meaſures, which his majeſty is informed your royal highneſs has been adviſed to purſue, will grant to your royal highneſs, for his majeſty's life, the ſaid fifty thouſand pounds per annum, to be iſſued out of his majeſty's civil-liſt revenues, over and above your royal highneſs's revenues ariſing from the dutchy of Cornwall; which his majeſty thinks a very competent allowance, conſidering his numerous iſſue, and the great expences which do, and muſt neceſſarily attend, an honourable proviſion for his royal family."

And that to this meſſage his royal highneſs the prince returned a verbal anſwer; which, according to the beſt recollection and remembrance of the lords, was in ſubſtance as follows:

"That his royal highneſs deſired the lords to lay him, with all humility, at his majeſty's feet; and to aſſure his majeſty, that he had, and ever ſhould retain the utmoſt duty for his royal perſon; that his royal highneſs was very thankful for any inſtance of his majeſty's goodneſs to him or the princeſs, and particularly for his majeſty's gracious intentions of ſettling a jointure upon her royal highneſs; but that, as to the meſſage, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no anſwer to it."

After which, his royal highneſs uſed many dutiful expreſſions towards his majeſty; and then added, "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands; I am ſorry for it;" or to that effect.

His royal highneſs concluded with earneſtly deſiring the lords to repreſent his anſwer to his majeſty in the moſt reſpectful and dutiful manner.

This meſſage made various impreſſions upon the houſe, and the oppoſition affected to treat the whole of it as a wicked artifice of the miniſter to divide the royal family, the better to ſupport his own power. The beſt ſpeakers in the houſe intereſted themſelves in this debate; but the queſtion being called for, a negative was put upon it, by a majority of two hundred and thirty-four againſt two hundred and four.

On the twenty-fifth of February, the ſame motion was made in the houſe of peers by lord Carteret; and the duke of Newcaſtle preſented from his majeſty the ſame meſſage that Sir Robert Walpole had delivered to the commons, and a like debate followed; but a negative was put upon the motion by a majority of ſeventy-nine peers preſent and twenty-four proxies, againſt twenty-eight peers preſent and twelve proxies; upon this a proteſt was entered by fourteen peers.

His royal highneſs the prince of Wales having now been prevailed upon to enter, in ſome meaſure, into the views of the oppoſition, it became the general opinion that the miniſter could not long hold his power. Some other great men, about the ſame time, began to be uneaſy; amongſt theſe was John duke of Argyle, elder brother to the earl of Hay.

The whole of the national debt, as delivered to the houſe of commons on the eighteenth of March, amounted to forty-ſeven millions, eight hundred and fifty-five thouſand, nine hundred and forty-eight pounds, three ſhillings and three-pence halfpenny; and ſome gentlemen thinking that the intereſt paid for it was too great, Sir John Barnard, on the twenty-firſt of March, moved in the committee of ſupply, "that his majeſty be enabled to raiſe money, either by ſale of annuities for years or lives, at ſuch rates as ſhould be preſcribed, or by borrowing at an intereſt not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming old and new South-ſea annuities; and that ſuch of the annuitants as ſhould be inclined to ſubſcribe their reſpective annuities, ſhould be preferred to all others."

Though this motion, and arguments urged in favour of it, were founded upon undeniable principles of public utility, yet it is incredible what a popular ſtorm was raiſed amongſt the annuitants, who were very numerous, againſt the friends of the motion. Though the miniſter was convinced of the juſtice and expedience of the meaſure, yet he was very ſhy of encouraging or giving way to the motion till the public could be brought to a better diſpoſition to bear it. But the arguments in favour of the meaſure were ſo forcible, that he was obliged to give way; and on the thirtieth of March, Sir Charles Turner reported from the committee of the whole houſe, to whom it was referred to conſider of the national debt,

"That it is the opinion of the committee, that all the public funds redeemable by law, that carry an intereſt at four per cent. per annum, be reduced according to the reſpective proviſo's or clauſes of redemption contained in the acts of parliament for that purpoſe, or, with conſent of the proprietors, be converted into an intereſt of annuity not exceeding three per cent. per annum, not redeemable till after fourteen years.

"That his majeſty be enabled to borrow from any perſon or perſons, bodies politic or corporate, any ſum or ſums of money, at an intereſt not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming the national debt."

Upon reading the firſt reſolution a ſecond time, ſome friends of the miniſter moved, that the conſideration of the report ſhould be adjourned for a fortnight; but a negative was put upon this motion by a majority of two hundred and twenty againſt one hundred and fifty-ſeven. Upon this it was moved, that the reſolution ſhould be re-committed; and it was agreed to, as was the ſecond, by the houſe, without any diviſion.

Though theſe reſolutions had received a form different from what Sir John Barnard originally moved for, yet they were thought to contain a good introduction to the leſſening of the national debt; and, upon their being agreed to, Sir John Barnard moved,

"That that houſe would, as ſoon as the intereſt of all the national redeemable debt ſhould be reduced to three per cent. per annum, take off ſome of the heavy taxes which oppreſs the poor and the manufacturers."

Though this motion was very plauſibly introduced and ſupported, yet it was built upon principles which the generality of the houſe could not agree to; for it ſuppoſed a fact that was denied, that the public taxes fell more heavy upon the poor, and the manufacturers in England, than in any other country; neither did it appear to the ſatisfaction of gentlemen, that the redeemable part of the national debt, being reduced to pay an intereſt of only three per cent. could compenſate for the loſſes the government muſt be at, if the taxes that fell heavy upon the poor and manufacturers, ſuch as ſoap, candles, leather, and ſalt, were taken off. But, above all, the motion was deficient in point of form and regularity; becauſe, as no body ſuppoſed that the reduction mentioned in the motion could take place that ſeſſion, and it might happen not to take place even during that parliament, ſhould the houſe have agreed to it, they muſt, in effect, have undertaken for a future ſeſſion, if not for a future parliament. The motion, therefore, after long debates, was thrown out by a majority of two hundred againſt one hundred and forty-two; for the progreſs which the reduction of the intereſt had made, occaſioned ſo great a noiſe as alarmed the miniſter, who now found himſelf obliged to oppoſe the bill itſelf.

On the twenty-ſecond of April, Sir John Barnard preſented the bill according to order; the ſecond reading was put off till the twenty-ninth, at which time a motion was made for committing it; Sir Robert Walpole publicly declared, "that he had had no hand or concern in the formation of the ſcheme, either in its original ſhape, or in that in which it now appeared; and that he never had, either in public or private, any conference with Sir John about that, or any other ſcheme." Sir John replied pretty ſmartly to this; and a debate enſued, in which the miniſter and his friends carried the queſtion againſt committing the bill, by a majority of two hundred and forty-nine againſt one hundred and thirty-four. A long debate, as uſual, happened upon the number of land-forces to be kept up; but little new matter was offered on either ſide, excepting that the oppoſition in both houſes charged the diſorders and tumults that had lately happened, to the diſlike the people had conceived againſt the numerous army that was kept up, and the great load of taxes they were obliged to pay for maintaining them. The miniſterial party, on the other hand, endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the ſeditious practices of their oppoſers; and maintained, there was then no ſafety for any well-wiſher to his majeſty, but in the neighbourhood of the army, or part of it. The number propoſed was continued, by a majority of two hundred and forty-ſix againſt one hundred and ſeventy-eight.

A bill likewiſe paſſed this ſeſſion for reſtraining the number of playhouſes, that had been ſo lately and ſo juſtly complained of; and for ſubjecting all dramatical performances exhibited on the ſtage, to a licence from the lord-chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, before they could be acted.

On the twenty-firſt of June, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech, in which he mentioned the licentiouſneſs of the times, "which, (ſaid he) under the colour and diſguiſe of liberty, you cannot be inſenſible what ſcandal and offence it gives to all honeſt and ſober men, and how abſolutely neceſſary it is to reſtrain this exceſſive abuſe by a due and vigorous execution of the laws. Defiance of all authority, contempt of magiſtracy, and even reſiſtance of the laws, are become too general, although equally prejudicial to the prerogative of the crown and the liberties of the people; the ſupport of the one being inſeparable from the protection of the other. I have," continued he, "made the laws of the land the conſtant rule of my actions; and I do, with reaſon, expect in return all that ſubmiſſion to my government and authority, which the ſame laws have made the duty, and ſhall always be the intereſt, of my ſubjects."

The lord chancellor then prorogued the parliament to the fourth of Auguſt, and by various ſubſequent prorogations, to the twenty-fourth of January enſuing.

The domeſtic events of this important year were various and affecting. A ſpirit of charity broke out among all ranks of people, and was led on by his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who ſent, in January, five hundred pounds for releaſing poor freemen of London out of priſon, where they were confined for debt; and a great number of others were diſcharged by the charitable donations of one Mr. Wright, a gentleman of great fortune, who died at Newington. A royal infirmary at Edinburgh for the maintenance of the ſick, was incorporated by his majeſty's charter, and met with great ſucceſs. About the ſame time Mr. Oglethorpe returned from Georgia with an account of the promiſing ſtate of that favourite colony, where the Indians had ſubmitted to his majeſty's authority. The Spaniſh government of Florida, and the council of War reſiding at St. Auguſtine, had ſigned a treaty with the colony; and beſides the town of Savannah, which was now in a flouriſhing ſtate, three other towns, Frederica, Auguſta, and Darien, were founded, and a new town called Ebenezer had been built by Saltzburghers, who had been obliged to leave their country, not by the perſecution of its government, but with regard to civil and religious liberties.

On the other hand, never were the common people known to be ſo diſſolute and turbulent. All the penalties of the law were inſufficient for reſtraining them from the uſe of pernicious ſtrong liquors, and the examples of juſtice which were made by the magiſtrates on that account, were repreſented by the enemies of the government, as ſo many acts of cruelty and oppreſſion. The truth is, that the law, as it then ſtood, was a little too ſevere upon the retailers of ſpiritous liquors, becauſe it admitted of no alleviation, through accident or inadvertence, of a hundred pounds fine for the ſmalleſt quantity ſold by retail. This was productive of very bad conſequences; for though ſome of the offenders were able to pay the penalty, yet many more being unable, they became deſperate, and betook themſelves to unlawful courſes of life. Hence it was that executions for robberies and murders of the moſt ſhocking kinds, now became frequent; and the government ſoon perceived, that the ſeverity of the law againſt drinking ſpirituous liquors would render it ineffectual.

A. D. 1738. On the fifteenth of January his majeſty arrived from Hanover at St. James's, and, in a grand council, which was immediately held, her majeſty ſurrendered to him her commiſſion for being ſole guardian of the kingdom in his abſence; and on the eighteenth her majeſty received the compliments of the city of London.

About this time died Dr. Wake, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He was a wiſe and moderate prelate, and had acquired great reputation by his writings againſt Atterbury, afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter, upon the rights and privileges of the convocation. His ſucceſſor was Dr. John Potter, biſhop of Oxford, whoſe promotion was obnoxious to no party; and who made a greater figure by his excellent account of the Greek antiquities, than he did by his polemical or theological writings.

Amongſt the many irregularities this ſpring produced, none was more inſolent than a conſpiracy amongſt the footmen in London and Weſtminſter, which went to ſo daring a height, that notwithſtanding the preſence of their royal highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales and others of the royal family, they attempted by force to poſſeſs themſelves of a gallery in the playhouſe. A great number of people were wounded upon this occaſion; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that colonel Deveil, the Weſtminſter juſtice of the peace, aſſiſted by a party of the guards could quell them. This inſolence was, in a great meaſure, owing to the diſcredit which the magiſtrates of Weſtminſter had incurred with the lower ranks of people. Moſt of the acting juſtices, being men of very ſmall fortunes, ſought to encreaſe them by making a trade of their duty; which being no ſecret to the commonalty, rendered them very obnoxious.

Sir John Norris, after an effectual expedition, arrived ſafe from Liſbon at Portſmouth in April. The mediation of his fleet had perfectly re-eſtabliſhed a good correſpondence between the crowns of Spain and Portugal; and his Portugueſe majeſty, at taking leave of Sir John, expreſſed himſelf in terms the moſt grateful towards his Britannic majeſty, and the Engliſh nation. But in proportion as the nation felt the benefit of the ſeaſonable relief ſent to the Portugueſe, ſhe become ſenſible of the neceſſity of breaking with Spain, if his Catholic majeſty did not ſhew more ſincerity in the cedulas he diſpatched to his governors in America.

The ſtate of Venice, at this time, having ſhewn great marks of honour and reſpect to the eldeſt ſon of the pretender, their reſident at London received orders from court to leave England in three days; which he accordingly did, in company with a meſſenger of ſtate. The inſult was thought to have been committed at the private inſtigation of the court of Spain.

The princeſs of Wales, who was advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy, but not thought to be ſo near her time as ſhe really was, being with their majeſties and the reſt of the royal family at Hampton-court, but without any midwife attending her, ſhe was, on the thirty-firſt of July, ſeized with the pains of child-birth, which increaſed ſo violently that the prince, who was with her, was obliged to bring her to London, and was that night delivered of a daughter, the princeſs Auguſta. His majeſty, on being acquainted with this unlooked for event, ſent a meſſage, by the earl of Eſſex, to the prince, congratulating him upon the birth of the princeſs; but at the ſame time expreſſing his diſpleaſure at his royal highneſs's conduct, in carrying away the princeſs from Hampton-court under the immediate pains of child-birth, to the hazard and danger both of the princeſs and her child, without acquainting his majeſty or the queen with the circumſtances the princeſs was in, or giving them the leaſt notice of his departure, was looked upon by his majeſty to be ſuch a deliberate indignity offered to himſelf and the queen, that he reſented it to the higheſt degree. His royal highneſs endeavoured to clear himſelf, by repreſenting the neceſſity of leaving Hampton-court without delay, conſidering the condition the princeſs was in; this he did in two letters, one addreſſed to his majeſty, and the other to the queen, both wrote in a very dutiful ſtrain. He repeated his importunity for a reconciliation, in a very humble meſſage he ſent next day, by the marquis of Carnarvon, one of the lords of his bedchamber; to neither of which he received any anſwer.

The king then ſent a meſſage by the earl of Dunmore to the prince of Wales, to acquaint him that it was his majeſty's pleaſure the baptiſm of the young princeſs ſhould be performed on the twenty-ninth, and that he would ſend his lord-chamberlain to ſtand as godfather in his place; that the queen's lady of the bedchamber would ſtand for her majeſty as godmother; and deſired the princeſs to appoint one of the ladies of her bedchamber to repreſent the dutcheſs dowager of Saxe-Gotha, as the other godmother; the ceremony to be performed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. This meſſage encouraged the prince to repeat again his application for a reconciliation with more earneſtneſs than ever, both to the king and queen; but on the tenth of September following, he received, by the duke of Grafton, a very ſevere meſſage from the king, reproaching him with his paſt conduct, and concluding with the following expreſſions:

"The whole of your conduct, for a conſiderable time, has been ſo entirely void of all real duty to me, that I have long had reaſon to be highly offended with you: and until you withdraw your regard and confidence from thoſe by whoſe inſtigation and advice you are directed and encouraged in your unwarrantable behaviour to me and the queen, and until you return to your duty, you ſhall not reſide in my palace, which I will not ſuffer to be made the reſort of them who, under the appearance of an attachment to you, foment the diviſion which you have made in my family, and thereby weaken the common intereſt of the whole.

"In this ſituation, I will receive no reply; but when your actions manifeſt a juſt ſenſe of your duty and ſubmiſſion, that may induce me to pardon what, at preſent, I moſt juſtly reſent. In the mean time, it is my pleaſure that you leave St. James's, with all your family, when it can be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princeſs. I ſhall, for the preſent, leave to the princeſs the care of my granddaughter, until a proper time calls upon me to conſider of her education."

The prince of Wales paid due obedience to this meſſage, and retired to Kew. He made ſeveral new efforts to regain his majeſty's favour, but they all proved ineffectual. He ordered lord Baltimore, one of his domeſtics, to apply to lord Grantham, chamberlain to the queen, to know whether her majeſty would receive a letter from him, in mitigation of his conduct; but her majeſty declined that. The princeſs then wrote an humble letter to the king, which was delivered by the earl of Pembroke. This his majeſty anſwered in terms full of affection and civility to the princeſs; but it appeared plainly, that his diſpleaſure towards the prince was rather increaſed than abated. The guards were now taken off from their attendance on the prince and princeſs; and thoſe who paid their court to them were not ſuffered to come into his majeſty's preſence.

The letters which paſſed between the royal family were printed by authority, and made various impreſſions on the minds of the people. All the prince's ſervants ſoon after joined the oppoſition to miniſtry.

The Spaniards ſtill continued to commit depredations upon the properties of Engliſh ſubjects in the Weſt-Indies and America. Three very rich ſhips had been lately taken by their guarda-coſtas. This freſh inſult upon the property of the nation obliged the merchants to addreſs his majeſty perſonally, which was done as follows:

"That the fair and lawful trade of your majeſty's ſubjects to the Britiſh plantations in America, hath been greatly interrupted for many years paſt, not only by their ſhips having been frequently ſtopped and ſearched, but alſo forcibly and arbitrarily ſeized on the high ſeas, by Spaniſh ſhips fitted out to cruize, under the plauſible pretence of guarding their own coaſts: that the commanders thereof, with their crews, have been inhumanly treated, and their ſhips carried into ſome of the Spaniſh ports, and there condemned, with their cargoes, in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns."

"That, notwithſtanding the many inſtances made by your majeſty's miniſters at the court of Madrid, againſt this injurious treatment, the late and repeated inſults of the Spaniards upon the perſons and properties of your majeſty's ſubjects, lay your petitioners under the neceſſity of applying again to your majeſty for relief.

"That by theſe violent and unjuſt proceedings of the Spaniards, the trade to your majeſty's plantations in America is rendered very precarious; and if any nation is ſuffered thus to inſult the perſons of your majeſty's ſubjects, and plunder them of their property, your petitioners apprehend it will be attended with ſuch an obſtruction of that valuable branch of commerce, as will be very fatal to the intereſt of Great-Britain.

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your majeſty, that your majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to procure ſpeedy and ample ſatisfaction to your ſubjects for the loſſes they have ſuſtained; and that no Britiſh veſſel be detained or ſeized on the high ſeas by any nation, on any pretext whatſoever; and that the trade to America may be rendered ſure for the future, by ſuch means as your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, ſhall think fit."

To this petition his majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer; and his ſecretary of ſtate ſent freſh orders to Mr. Keene to repeat his inſtances, at the court of Madrid, for their relief. A committee of the privy-council ſat at Whitehall, and heard the proofs of the loſſes which the merchants had ſuffered by the Spaniards.

This year died, greatly lamented, queen Caroline, in the fiftieth year of her age. She had been, for ſome time, indiſpoſed, and had taken medicines for the gout in her ſtomach, but her diſorder proved to be a concealed rupture. The virtues which adorned this princeſs were various and numerous; her conjugal affection was exemplary: the king always found in her a wiſe and a faithful counſellor; and when ſhe was intruſted, as ſhe frequently was, with the reins of government, the public was happy under her adminiſtration. Her natural ſagacity and talents were improved by reading and converſing with the moſt eminent philoſophers and authors of the age; and ſhe had made ſo great a progreſs in literature, that ſhe became an umpire in one of the moſt abſtruſe points of metaphyſical reaſoning, the doctrine of free-will and fatality, as diſputed between Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke. The ingenious were always ſure of a patronage in this amiable princeſs; and the bench of biſhops, through her means, was filled with prelates eminent for their learning.

The king was prodigiouſly afflicted, for a length of time, at his irreparable loſs; and the public likewiſe ſhewed every mark of concern they could teſtify upon this melancholy occaſion.

A war broke out this year between the Turks and the Ruſſians, and between the Turks and the Imperialiſts. The Ruſſian army was commanded by count Munich, who carried on the campaign with great ſucceſs. He beſieged and took Oczakow, one of the ſtrongeſt cities in the Turkiſh dominions, garriſoned by twenty thouſand of their beſt troops. This ſucceſs, which was, in a great meaſure, owing to the valour of general Keith, coſt the Ruſſians very dear, and diſabled Munich from carrying his conqueſts farther. At the ſame time, general Laſci, at the head of another Muſcovite army, marched towards Precop, with a deſign to carry the war into Crim Tartary, which he effected.

Though theſe operations were carried on in concert with the Imperialiſts, the latter were far from being ſo ſucceſsful. The duke of Lorrain had nominally the command of their army; but count Seckendorff, an old man and a proteſtant, was the acting general. The emperor had given him this command, in compliment to the diet of the empire, by whom he was aſſiſted in the war. The ſcheme of operations was, that Seckendorff ſhould advance, with the main body of the army, and attack Widin, upon the Danube; but finding that place too advantageouſly ſituated to be reduced, without a ſquadron of ſhips, he ſuddenly attacked Niſſa, one of the ſtrongeſt towns upon the Turkiſh frontier, which ſurrendered. The reſt of the campaign on that ſide was unfortunate for the Imperialiſts. The exceſſive heats killed great numbers of their men, and Seckendorff, through the management of the Roman catholic party and the jeſuits, had not the proper ſupplies of either men or money. Being obliged to divide his army, he formed with one part of it the blockade of Widin, which he was forced to abandon with loſs. The baron de Raunach, another imperial general, having penetrated, at the head of ſix thouſand men, into Croatia, was entirely routed; and the prince of Saxhilburghauſen, who had formed the ſiege of Bagnalac, was defeated by a ſuperior body of Turks, who deſtroyed the beſt part of his army, which conſiſted of fourteen thouſand men. Theſe repeated loſſes threw the court of Vienna into conſternation: Seckendorff was ordered home to account for his conduct, and the command was given to velt-marſhal Philippi. Notwithſtanding thoſe and a great many other important advantages gained by the Turks on the ſide of Boſnia and Servia, their governor ſeemed very deſirous of a peace; and ſome conferences on that head had been held at Niemeren; but as the Ruſſians inſiſted upon keeping poſſeſſion of Aſoph and Oczakow, they proved fruitleſs; and all parties went into winter quarters.

A.D. 1739. His majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the twenty-fourth of January. His ſpeech upon that occaſion was remarkably ſhort, and exhorted the houſe to unanimity and diſpatch. They, on the other hand, returned him very loyal addreſſes of condoleance upon her majeſty's death. The firſt buſineſs of great importance they went upon, was the ſtate of affairs between Great Britain and Spain. His majeſty had referred the examination of the complaints of the Britiſh merchants to a committee of the privy-council, where they attempted to make good their allegations. Having no one to oppoſe them, the public unanimouſly took their part, and every day brought freſh accounts of depredations committed upon Britiſh ſubjects, not only in the American, but in the European ſeas. The court of Spain did not indeed directly juſtify all thoſe captures, and to give its proceedings an air of moderation, the crews three Engliſh ſhips which had, upon frivolous pretexts, been taken in the Mediterranean, and impriſoned in Spain, were ordered to be releaſed; and in ſome flagrant caſes in the Weſt Indies, the ſhips that had been taken, were releaſed, upon the owners giving ſecurity for the value, if they ſhould be adjudged to be lawful prizes.

On the third of March a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons from divers merchants, planters, and others, trading to, and intereſted in the Britiſh plantations in America. After recapitulating all that had paſſed in conſequence of former applications of the ſame kind, the petitioners ſet forth, "That the Spaniards had paid ſo little regard to his majeſty's moſt gracious endeavours (to obtain juſtice to his ſubjects) that they had continued their depredations, almoſt ever ſince the treaty of Seville, and more particularly laſt year, had carried them to a greater height than ever; they having arbitrarily ſeized ſeveral ſhips with their effects, belonging to his majeſty's ſubjects, on the high ſeas, in the deſtined courſe of their voyages to and from the Britiſh colonies, amounting to a very conſiderable value; and that the captains or maſters of the ſaid ſhips were, according to the laſt advices of the petitioners, and are, as the petitioners believe, at this time, confined by the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies, and the crews are now in ſlavery in Old Spain, where they are moſt inhumanly treated; and that cruel nation make it their practice to attack and board all Britiſh merchant ſhips they meet with in the American ſeas, under pretence of ſearching for goods which they deem contraband, or not according to their own arbitrary will and pleaſure, contrary to the law of nations, and in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns. And that by theſe unjuſt and violent proceedings of the Spaniards, the trade and navigation to and from America, is rendered very unſafe and precarious, inſomuch that the inſurance from Jamaica has greatly riſen on theſe accounts only: and that without ſome ſpeedy and effectual remedy, the American trade and navigation will be, together with the revenue of the crown ariſing therefrom, greatly diminiſhed, if not entirely loſt: and farther repreſenting to the houſe, that although his Catholic majeſty has ſtipulated by the treaty of Seville, and by the declaration of 1732, relative thereto, to cauſe reparation to be forthwith made to the unhappy ſufferers, yet there is no inſtance of its having been done; ſo far from it, that whilſt the Britiſh ſubjects have been amuſed with vain and fruitleſs hopes of ſatisfaction, the Spaniards have committed farther inſults and depredations upon them, and ſtill continue the ſame unjuſt practices; and that the cedulas or orders given by the court of Spain to their governors in America, are only calculated, as the petitioners, by experience, have reaſon to apprehend, to evade giving ſatisfaction to the Britiſh ſubjects; for there has never been one of thoſe cedulas complied with, nor any governor recalled or puniſhed for his diſobedience, as the petitioners ever heard: and that for any nation to aſſume the power of detaining or rummaging the Britiſh ſhips, upon their lawful voyages on the American ſeas, is, in effect, the petitioners conceive, claiming and exerciſing the ſole ſovereignty of thoſe ſeas: and that if the Spaniards be ſuffered to act in this injurious manner, to inſult the perſons of his majeſty's ſubjects, or to plunder them of their property, the petitioners apprehend the ſame will be attended not only with a great obſtruction to this valuable branch of our commerce and navigation, but alſo with conſequences very fatal to Great Britain itſelf: and therefore, as the meaſures hitherto purſued have proved ineffectual, praying the houſe to take the premiſes into their mature conſideration, and provide ſuch timely and adequate remedy for putting an end to all inſults and depredations on the Britiſh ſubjects, as to the houſe ſhall ſeem meet, as well as procure ſuch relief for the unhappy ſufferers, as the nature of their loſs, and the juſtice of their cauſe, require, and that they may be heard by themſelves and counſel thereupon."

This petition was referred to a committee of the whole houſe, as was another petition to the ſame effect, preſented on behalf of the maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants, and commonalty of the ſociety of merchant adventurers within the city of Briſtol. On the ſame day, a petition upon a particular caſe was laid before the houſe, and made great noiſe: it was from the owner of the ſhip Ann Galley, which was taken in a time of profound peace, bound from Guinea to Jamaica. This capture, which the owner ſaid was in value ten thouſand five hundred pounds, was ſo flagitious, that the Spaniſh miniſtry frequently ordered reparation to be made to the petitioners, and they actually received upwards of five hundred pounds from the Spaniſh cheſt at St. Jago, by way of compenſation. But that not being near the value of their damages, though the Spaniſh miniſtry had admitted the capture to be illegal, and had even ordered full ſatisfaction to be made to the owners, they therefore brought their petition for relief. Another petition of the ſame kind was preſented at the ſame time, and all of them were referred to the ſame committee.

It was then moved "to addreſs his majeſty for copies of the ſeveral petitions, repreſentations, and memorials, and all other papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations upon the Britiſh ſubjects, which had been preſented to his majeſty, or had been delivered to either of the ſecretaries of ſtate ſince the firſt of September laſt; with copies of ſuch repreſentations or memorials as had been made either to the king of Spain or his miniſters; and of the letters written to his majeſty's miniſter at Madrid; and of the anſwers that have been given or received to ſuch memorials, repreſentations, and letters."

The ſubſtance of this motion was not oppoſed by the miniſter; but he thought that complying entirely with it might diſcover particulars, of which a bad uſe might be made: he therefore inſiſted upon not addreſſing for the anſwers that had been given or received to ſuch memorials, repreſentations, and letters. This brought on a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameneſs of the Engliſh miniſtry, were equally exaggerated. The chief ſpeakers on both ſides exerted themſelves upon this occaſion; but the miniſter adhered to his point, that as affairs were then ſituated, it would be imprudent to plunge the nation into a war, without trying whether it was poſſible to bring Spain to terms, of which there was then great probability. All that the oppoſition urged, with any appearance of truth, was admitted of by the miniſter, who was more frank on this head than ſome of his friends; for they were apt to throw out reflections againſt the ſmuggling trade, which the ſubjects of Great-Britain carried on in the Weſt-Indies, contrary to treaties. The oppoſition immediately turned this into a reflection upon the whole body of the Britiſh merchants in America, and were always ready to give the moſt ſhocking inſtances of the cruelties of the Spaniards againſt the Engliſh; and that they were of ſuch a nature, as, in fact, admitted of no farther treaty. Some of them went even ſo far as to ſay, that the motion was ſo fair and conſtitutional, that it was not ſafe for the miniſter to oppoſe it.

Sir Robert Walpole owned, with great candour, that the laſt anſwer which had come from the Spaniſh miniſtry, was ſo far from being ſatisfactory, that if the houſe ſhould ſee it, and if (as it unavoidably muſt) it ſhould come to the knowledge of the public, very bad conſequences muſt follow. The parliament and nation, unacquainted with the reaſons which his majeſty and his miniſtry might have for avoiding a precipitate war, would preſs it; and his majeſty muſt either comply, contrary to the true intereſts of his people, or he muſt diſagreeably exerciſe that part of his prerogative, which veſts him with the power of making war or peace. He intreated the gentlemen to conſider, that even though the preſent motion was carried without any amendment, it was in his majeſty's breaſt to comply, or not to comply with it; and if the houſe ſhould addreſs for a paper or papers, which his majeſty and his miniſtry were conſcious ought not to be made public, they muſt lay his majeſty under the hardſhip of refuſing it. He acquainted them, that the Britiſh miniſtry, notwithſtanding the harſhneſs of the laſt anſwer from Spain, had ſent to that court ſome propoſitions which might ſoften them, and which, in all probability, would ſoon be anſwered. If they were not anſwered to the ſatiſfaction of his majeſty, he himſelf would move, that every paper relating to Spain, even their laſt anſwer, ſhould be laid before the houſe; but that, till then, it would be highly improper to comply with the motion. He next made a recapitulation of the late treaties and tranſactions between England and Spain; and he endeavoured to prove, that the ſtiffneſs of the Spaniards was owing to the perplexed ſtate of affairs in Europe ſince the treaty of Seville, which did not admit of the meeting of the commiſſaries for adjuſting the pretenſions on both ſides, ſo as to make a final report of their commiſſion. He obſerved, that the ſentiments of certain gentlemen againſt the Spaniards, ſince that time, were greatly altered; and that the claims which the Engliſh had upon them were far from being looked upon, either at home or abroad, to be ſo clear as they were then repreſented, which appears by their being referred to a congreſs. He next attempted to ſhew, that the Spaniards had hitherto done as much to ſatisfy the Engliſh ſufferers as could be well expected. The diſtance between Madrid and the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, from whence the proofs muſt be brought, was very great. The Spaniſh governors were extremely inſolent, and, in ſome meaſure, arbitrary, and independent upon the miniſtry; ſo that it was no wonder if that court ſometimes found difficulty in bringing them to reaſon. He even gave inſtances of ſome Engliſh ſhips that had been abſolutely releaſed by the Spaniards; of others, that had been releaſed, upon giving ſecurity to ſtand trial whether they had been engaged in an illicit trade or not; and he mentioned others, that the court of Madrid ſeemed very well diſpoſed towards ſatisfying their claims; and, to conclude, he was for amending the queſtion that had been moved for.

Sir William Wyndham, and the other heads of the oppoſition, were ſenſible of the advantages they had in an argument which had ſo highly enflamed the paſſions of the nation. They perceived the miniſter aimed at fixing the retroſpect of the Spaniſh depredations no farther back than the treaty of Seville; but they obſerved, that the cauſes of complaints had exiſted for theſe twenty years; and that little or no redreſs having yet been obtained, the houſe ought, for the honour and intereſt of the nation, to be informed of the reaſons, which they could not be without complying with the motion in its full extent: that the public and ſufferers had a right to all the ſatisfaction which the houſe could give them; and if they could give them none upon the Spaniards, they ought at leaſt to know who were the authors of their calamities at home, by a timid, diſgraceful conduct, in ſo long delaying to repreſs force with force.

The miniſter's ſpeech had a great effect upon the houſe, and he carried the queſtion by a majority of one hundred and ſixty-four againſt ninety-nine.

Mr. Pulteney then made a motion in the houſe of commons for leave to bring in a bill "for the more effectually ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſubjects in America. In order to introduce this motion, he moved, that the ſixth and eighth ſections of an act paſſed in the ſixth of queen Anne, intituled, An act for the better ſecuring the trade of the kingdom by cruizers and convoys, ſhould be read; and likewiſe the ſecond ſection of an act made in the ſame ſeſſion, intituled, An act for the encouragement of the trade to America. It was upon theſe two bills that the ſubſtance of this act moved for was founded, and both of them were thought neceſſary at the time they paſſed. The intention of the act now propoſed, was to give the property of all prizes taken from the Spaniards after the declaration of war, to the officers and ſeamen preſent in the action. Head-money of five pounds for every Spaniard taken at ſea, was likewiſe granted to the ſailors; and the property of all places taken from the Spaniards, was to be veſted, by his majeſty's patent, in the captors.

Little oppoſition was made to this bill when it was firſt propoſed; but when a motion was made for a ſecond reading, it was ſtrongly oppoſed by Sir Robert Walpole. He obſerved, that with regard to the firſt article, if hoſtilities were immediately to commence againſt Spain, and a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips of war was to take the whole Plate fleet or flotilla of the Spaniards, with all their regiſter ſhips, every ſhilling of it muſt become the property of the Engliſh ſeamen, though it was publicly known that not one fifth part of that treaſure belonged to the Spaniards, but was the property of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe. As to the granting head-money for every Spaniard taken at open ſea, he approved of very much, as ſoon as war ſhould be declared. The third article he thought of a very dangerous nature; and that, if it paſſed into an act, it muſt effectually preclude the concluding any ſafe and honourable peace; becauſe, in all negotiations of peace, ſome places on both ſides are commonly given up to facilitate it, which could not be done if his majeſty, by letters patent, ſhould part with the property to private owners.

He then urged with great energy, that, ſhould the act in queſtion immediately take place, without being greatly amended, it muſt be attended with the abſolute ruin of the Britiſh commerce all over Europe. It muſt give an alarm to the French for their property, which is greater than that of the Spaniards themſelves on board their American fleets; and that the French court, in ſuch a caſe, would not heſitate to take part with Spain, and join her with all her naval force to convoy the Spaniſh plate fleet to Europe; beſides, moſt of the French, the Dutch, and the Daniſh property at ſea, were inſured in England or Holland in time of peace, and therefore the loſs, in fact, muſt fall upon the Britiſh and Dutch inſurers, as they could have no pretext to indemnify the French and other nations for the loſſes they would ſuſtain; ſo that the bill, if paſſed into a law, might ruin the Dutch as well as the Britiſh inſurers. He deſired the houſe to conſider, in ſuch an event, what muſt be the caſe of the Britiſh merchants then reſiding in Spain, their perſons, their ſhips, and their properties, all which the Spaniards would certainly ſequeſter. "What muſt the Dutch," ſaid he, "think of ſuch a bill? or what power in Europe can be our hearty friend, ſhould it, at this time, paſs into a law?"

In anſwer to thoſe who inſinuated, that he was afraid of a war becauſe peace was his only ſafety, he ſaid, "It was but a mean excuſe for a miniſter when any wrong ſtep is made in government, that he is not accountable for the events of meaſures that never were adviſed by him, and in which he was over-ruled by his ſuperiors. I have always diſdained thoſe mean ſubterfuges; and with what face can I appear again in this houſe, if full and ample ſatisfaction is not made us, or, at leaſt, if we do not do our utmoſt to obtain it; either by fair and peaceable means, or by exerting all our ſtrength in caſe a war becomes neceſſary. If my country ſhould call me to account, I would willingly take upon me the blame of every ſtep that has been made by the government, ſince I had the honour to enter into the adminiſtration. As to the common notion of a miniſter being afraid to enter upon a war, I do not underſtand upon what it can be grounded. For my part, I never could ſee any cauſe, either from reaſon or my own experience, to imagine a miniſter is not as ſafe in time of war as in time of peace. Nay, Sir, if we are to judge by reaſon alone, it is the intereſt of a miniſter, conſcious of any miſmanagement, that there ſhould be a war; becauſe by a war, the eyes of the public are diverted from examining into his conduct; nor is he accountable for the bad ſucceſs of a war, as he is for that of an adminiſtration."

The miniſtry were now endeavouring to get a deciſive anſwer from the court of Spain, but not being able to obtain one, the examinations and enquiries about depredations went on with more fury than ever in both houſes of parliament. Mr. Pulteney at laſt brought into the houſe of commons, which he moved for in a ſpeech, the following ſet of reſolutions.

"That it is the natural and undoubted right of the Britiſh ſubjects to ſail with their ſhips on any part of the ſeas of America, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions; and that ſeizing and confiſcating ſuch ſhips as are not ſailing and trafficking in the ports and havens, which have fortifications, caſtles, magazines, or warehouſes, or other places poſſeſſed by the king of Spain, is contrary to equity and juſtice, and a manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns. That it is the indiſputable right of the ſubjects of Great Britain to carry in their ſhips all ſorts of goods, merchandize, or effects, from one part of the Britiſh dominions to any other part of the Britiſh dominions; and that no goods or merchandize being ſo carried, are, by the laws of nations, or any treaty between the two crowns, to be deemed or taken as contraband goods; and that the ſearching of ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of finding contraband goods, is highly injurious to the trade of this kingdom, a violation of the law of nations, and an infraction of the treaty ſubſiſting between the two crowns. That the ſubjects of Great Britain did hold and poſſeſs lands in the province of Jucantan in America, anticedent to, and at the time of the treaty of 1670; which treaty confirmed the right to each contracting party of ſuch lands or places as either did at that time hold and poſſeſs; and that the ſubjects of Great Britain then had, and have at all times ſince, claimed a right of cutting logwood in the bay of Campeachy, and enjoyed the ſame, without interruption, till of late years; which right ſeems further particularly ſecured to us by the manner in which the firſt article of the treaty of 1670, with thoſe remarkable words, "Without prejudice to any liberty or power which the ſubjects of Great Britain enjoyed either through right, ſufferance, or indulgence." That the attacking a fleet of Britiſh ſhips gathering ſalt in the iſland of Tortugas, then under convoy of one of his majeſty's ſhips of war, by two men of war belonging to the king of Spain, was a notorious infraction of the convention ſigned at Madrid December 14, 1715, and an high inſult on the honour due to the flag of Great Britain. That for many years laſt paſt, the liberty of navigation in the American ſeas hath been unjuſtly diſturbed by the Spaniards, under pretence of ſearching for, and finding, illicit trade; the Britiſh ſhips unlawfully ſeized, upon the open ſeas, plundered and confiſcated; the ſailors robbed, inhumanly tortured, impriſoned and made ſlaves; to the grievous loſs of the merchants, the obſtruction of the commerce, and the diſhonour of the nation. That, notwithſtanding the repeated application of parliament, the treaty of Seville, and the aſſurances ſo frequently given to merchants of procuring reparation for their loſſes and ill uſuage; and notwithſtanding the expectation of the nation of receiving juſt and ample ſatisfaction for the cruelties exerciſed on its ſubjects, and the inſults offered to itſelf, nothing has in ſo many years been obtained from the court of Spain effectually to ſatisfy the loſſes, repair the injuries, or retrieve the honour of the nation; though the ſaid treaty of Seville, ſo advantageous to Spain, hath been punctually executed on the part of Great Britain."

Sir Robert Walpole told the houſe that he was very ready to agree to the firſt part of the reſolution, upon the natural and undoubted right which the ſubjects had to ſail with their ſhips in any part of the ſeas of America, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions. He obſerved, that conſidering the ſtate of the negotiation between Spain and England at that time, it would be much more eligible to make the reſolutions the houſe agreed to, not quite ſo peremptory and ſo particular. He therefore propoſed that the reſt of the reſolutions ſhould run as follows:

"That the freedom of navigation and commerce, which the ſubjects of Great Britain have an undoubted right to by the law of nations, and which is not in the leaſt reſtrained by any of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, has been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundleſs and unjuſt. That before and ſince the execution of the treaty of Seville, that the declaration made by the crown of Spain purſuant thereto, for the ſatisfaction and ſecurity of the commerce of Great Britain, many unjuſt ſeizures and captures have been made, and great depredations committed by the Spaniards, which have been attended with many inſtances of unheard of cruelty and barbarity. That the frequent application made to the court of Spain, for procuring juſtice and ſatisfaction to his majeſty's injured ſubjects, for bringing the offenders to condign puniſhment, and for preventing the like abuſes for the future, have proved vain and ineffectual; and the ſeveral orders or cedulas, granted by the king of Spain for reſtitution and reparation of the great loſſes ſuſtained, by the unlawful and unwarrantable ſeizures and captures made by the Spaniards, have been diſobeyed by the Spaniſh governors, or totally evaded and eluded. And that theſe violences and depredations have been carried on to the great loſs and damage of the ſubjects of Great Britain trading to America, and in direct violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns."

Theſe amendments occaſioned great debates, but the miniſter and his friends maintained, that the reſolutions moved by him, contained all that could be reaſonably expected from Spain at that time; and with regard either to poſſeſſion or navigation, it could not be effected or weakened by the houſe agreeing to the amendment; which the houſe, after a long debate, complied with, upon a diviſion of two hundred and twenty-four, againſt one hundred and ſixty-three, and an addreſs to be preſented by the whole houſe was accordingly voted.

During this period the lords were no leſs anxious than the commons, in their enquiries into theſe important affairs. The earl of Cholmondley had prepared a ſet of reſolutions, which had a much greater tendency to obtain ſatisfaction to the nation, than thoſe debated in the houſe of commons. Lord Carteret, in a very fine ſpeech, ſhewed, that after the concluſion of the American treaty in 1670, none of the articles in 1667 are applicable to the American navigation by the Engliſh and Spaniards. He made a deduction as far back as the peace of Munſter, to ſhew that the baſis of all European commerce in America conſiſted in each nation reſerving to itſelf an excluſive right to trade with its own colonies and plantations there; and that therefore, no ſhip which was not actually in the ports and harbours of Spain, could be ſuppoſed either ſearchable or ſeizable by the Spaniards. He proved, beyond a doubt, that all the modes of viſiting and ſearching mentioned and preſcribed by the treaty of 1667, was applicable to the European navagation alone, and not to the American; "because," ſaid he, "that very treaty takes it for granted, that no trade between the Spaniards and the Engliſh can be carried on there, and conſequently there can be no object of ſearch, unleſs the ſhips of one power ſhall be found actually trading within the ports and harbours of the other." As to the claim the Spaniards made of ſtopping ſhips within a certain ſpace from the ſhore, he demonſtrated to be unjuſt and groundleſs; becauſe, in a coaſt ſo extenſive, ſo uncertain, and ſo little known as that of America, it was often impoſſible for Britiſh ſubjects to navigate their ſhips, ſo as to prevent their being ſometimes forced by ſqualls and currents, and ſometimes to know in what part of the world they were, to prevent their making land, and often coming within the diſtance which the Spaniards pretended gave them a right to ſeize them. His lordſhip enforced his arguments with ſo much clearneſs, that they agreed to preſent the following addreſs:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, having taken into our ſerious conſideration, the many unjuſt violences and depredations committed by the Spaniards, upon the perſons, ſhips and effects of your majeſty's ſubjects in America, have come to the following reſolutions, which we beg, in the humbleſt manner, to lay before your majeſty for your royal conſideration, viz.

I. "Reſolved that the ſubjects of Great Britain have a clear and undoubted right to navigate in the American ſeas, to and from any part of his majeſty's dominions; and for carrying on ſuch trade and commerce, as they are juſtly entitled to in America; and alſo to carry all ſorts of goods, merchandizes, and effects from one part of his majeſty's dominions to any other part thereof; and that no goods being ſo carried, are, by any treaty ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the ſearching of ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of their carrying prohibited or contraband goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns.

II. "Reſolved, that it appears to this houſe, as well before as ſince the treaty of Seville, on the part of Great Britain, divers ſhips and veſſels with their cargoes belonging to the Britiſh ſubjects, have been violently ſeized and confiſcated by the Spaniards, upon pretences altogether unjuſt and groundleſs; and that many of the ſailors on board ſuch ſhips have been injuriouſly and barbarouſly impriſoned and ill treated; and that thereby the liberty of navigation and commerce belonging to his majeſty's ſubjects, by the law of nations, and by virtue of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, hath been unwarrantably infringed and interrupted, to the great loſs and damage of our merchants, and in direct violation of the ſaid treaties.

III. "Reſolved, that it appears to this houſe, that frequent applications have been made on the part of his majeſty to the court of Spain, in a manner the moſt agreeable to treaties, and to the peace and friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two crowns, for redreſſing the notorious abuſes and grievances before mentioned, and preventing the like for the future, and for obtaining adequate ſatisfaction to his injured ſubjects, which in the event have proved entirely fruitleſs and of no effect.

"We think it our duty, on this important occaſion, humbly to repreſent to your majeſty, that we are moſt ſenſibly affected with the many and grievous injuries and loſſes, ſuſtained by your majeſty's trading ſubjects, by means of theſe unwarrantable depredations and ſeizures; and to give your majeſty the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſincere aſſurances, that in caſe your friendly and powerful inſtances for procuring reſtitution and reparation to your injured ſubjects, and for the future ſecurity of their trade and navigation, ſhall fail of having their due effect and influence in the court of Spain, and ſhall not be able to obtain that great ſatisfaction and ſecurity which your majeſty may in juſtice expect; we will zealouſly and chearfully concur in all ſuch meaſures, as ſhall become neceſſary for the ſupport of your majeſty's honour; the preſervation of our navigation and commerce, and the common good of theſe kingdoms."

His majeſty returned the following anſwer:

"My lords,

"I am ſenſibly touched with the many hardſhips and injuries ſuſtained by my trading ſubjects in America, from the cruelties and unjuſt depredations of the Spaniards. You may be aſſured of my care to procure ſatisfaction and reparation for the loſſes they have already ſuffered, and ſecurity for the freedom of navigation for the future; and to maintain to my people the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they are entitled by treaty and the law of nations.

"I doubt not but I ſhall have your concurrence for the ſupport of ſuch meaſures, as may be neceſſary for that purpoſe."

This important queſtion between Spain and England, ſo entirely employed the attention of the public, that very little regard was paid to other affairs, which happened in the courſe of this ſeſſion, though ſome of them were of importance. Two millions were granted to his majeſty, for the ſervice of the current year, and for paying to the governor and company of the bank of England one million for redeeming an annuity of forty thouſand pounds payable to them. Another act of great importance that paſſed this ſeſſion was, for building a bridge croſs the river Thames, from the Woolſtaple, Weſtminſter, to the oppoſite ſhore in Surry. Some farther regulations were likewiſe made with regard to the drinking ſpirituous liquors; and thoſe already made having been found ineffectual, and productive of many perjuries, a power had been granted to retail ſpirituous liquors with licences. But this had rather increaſed than diminiſhed the diſorder complained of; and an act paſſed this ſeſſion, by which a penalty was laid on all occupiers of houſes in which ſpirituous liquors were illegally ſold.

On the fourteenth of June, the king came to the houſe, and put put an end to the ſeſſion in a ſpeech, wherein he earneſtly recommended unanimity among the members; and deſired them to tranſmit, by their example, peace throughout their different counties.

Great pains had been taken to conceal from the people the ſtate of our connections with Spain; but the continual depredations committed upon our trading veſſels in different parts of America, alarmed the whole nation, and a war ſeemed inevitable. Mr. Keene, our ambaſſador at Madrid, delivered a remonſtrance to the Spaniſh miniſtry, complaining of the conduct of their naval officers, and demanding reſtitution of ſuch goods as had been ſeized from the Britiſh ſubjects. Great augmentations were made to our land forces, by raiſing ten new regiments, and filling up ſuch as had been reduced. Nor was the navy neglected; for many ſhips that had been laid up were put in commiſſion, and there was an exceeding hot preſs for ſailors in all the ſea-port towns in the kingdom. Orders were ſent to admiral Brown, then ſtationed at Jamaica, to make repriſals on the Spaniards, and every thing ſeemed to wear a promiſing appearance, and the nation in general was ſatisfied.

The ſources from whence the Spaniards derive their wealth, became an object of national concern to Great Britain; and therefore it was propoſed that two ſquadrons ſhould be fitted out, one under the command of captain Cornwall, and another under captain Anſon. That under captain Cornwall was to ſail round Cape Horn, into the South Seas, in order to attack ſuch of the Spaniſh ſettlements as lay near the coaſt; but if he found that impracticable, he was to ſail to the Manilla, one of the Phillippine iſlands. Captain Anſon was to ſail to Java-head, a promontory in the Eaſt-Indies, where he was to take in freſh water, with ſuch other neceſſaries as his ſquadron ſhould want, and then to proceed on his voyage to meet captain Cornwall at Manilla. This ſcheme was ſo agreeable to all ranks of people in the nation, that harmony began to take place of diſcord, and all ſeemed united to contribute towards diſtreſſing the common enemy.

But ſtill it was neceſſary that a much more reſpectable ſquadron than either of thoſe already mentioned ſhould be fitted out; and accordingly nine ſhips of the line, with ſeveral ſmaller ones, were ordered to ſail for the Weſt-Indies, under the command of admiral Vernon, an officer of conſummate knowledge, undaunted courage, and great prudence. He was ſtrongly attached to the intereſts of his country; he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the houſe of commons againſt ſome ſchemes of the miniſtry; but no ſooner did he conſider the nation in danger, than he forgot every thing like diſcontent, and chearfully took upon him the command of the ſquadron.

Every preparation for war, by both powers, then only wanted the form of a declaration, and that took place on the nineteenth of October. This meaſure was in its own nature abſolutely neceſſary; for both the honour and intereſt of the nation were at ſtake. Our merchants had been plundered of their moſt valuable goods, and ſo puſillanimous were our miniſtry, that the Britiſh flag ſeemed falling into diſgrace. Complaints, indeed, had been often made to the miniſtry, but the perſons injured were either refuſed redreſs, or diſmiſſed with ambiguous promiſes. But the declaration of war gave new hopes to the people, and although they knew it had not been done till abſolutely neceſſary, yet they began to have ſome confidence in the miniſtry.

Soon after the declaration of war, admiral Haddock took a rich Spaniſh ſhip; but the Spaniſh admiral, who commanded the ſquadron, returning from the South Seas, having received notice, or rather ſuſpecting that ſome of our ſhips of war would attempt to intercept him off Cadiz, he ſailed north round Ireland, and from thence coaſting by the Land's-end of England, arrived ſafe in Spain, to the great mortification of the Engliſh ſailors, who expected to acquire an immenſe booty.

It was the opinion of moſt people in general, that the French would take part with the Spaniards, and ſuch was the conduct of the ſtates-general, that no confidence could be placed even in their moſt ſolemn proteſtations. Mr. Walpole, our ambaſſador at the Hague, endeavoured to perſuade them to take part with us, as their natural ally, but he received only evaſive anſwers; from which it ſeemed evident that they intended to remain neuter till their own territories ſhould be attacked. With reſpect to the Spaniards, they were filled with conſternation when they found what preparations we were making againſt them, for the timid behaviour of our miniſtry had induced them to look upon the people of England as diveſted of that courage for which they had been ſo long diſtinguiſhed.

On the continent, the emperor of Germany, Charles VI. in conſequence of ſome loſſes, found himſelf under the neceſſity of concluding a treaty of peace with the Turks, upon terms neither honourable nor advantageous. The empreſs of Ruſſia, whoſe forces acted in concert with thoſe of the emperor, was obliged to follow his example, and recall her army without having obtained any ſingular advantages.

On the fifteenth of November the Britiſh parliament met, and the king in his ſpeech informed them, that contrary to his own inclination, but conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown, and the intereſt of his ſubjects, he had declared war againſt Spain, not doubting but the commons would chearfully contribute ſuch ſums as were wanting to maintain the army and the navy. Both houſes were ſo well pleaſed with his majeſty's ſpeech, that moſt loyal addreſſes were preſented to him, and the commons declared that nothing ſhould be wanting to defray every neceſſary expence. And that a complete triumph might be obtained over the miniſtry, Sir William Wyndham moved, that an addreſs might be preſented to his majeſty, praying that no treaty of peace ſhould be entered into with Spain, till the Britiſh ſovereignty was acknowledged in America.

The miniſtry were ſo well convinced of the reaſonableneſs and popularity of the motion, that they made no oppoſition to it; and his majeſty, in anſwer to the commons, told them, that they might depend upon his ſteady perſeverance in rejecting all terms of a diſhonourable nature. Some very popular acts paſſed at this time, though not without oppoſition from the miniſtry, who ſeemed to have nothing ſo much at heart as that of croſſing every meaſure that ſeemed productive of public good. Great encouragement was given to foreign ſeamen to enter into our merchants ſervice; and ſome thouſands of the perſecuted proteſtants in Germany, were invited by our government to ſettle in America.

Lord Polworth, now earl of Marchmount, propoſed, that in compaſſion to the people already burthened with very heavy taxes, no unneceſſary officers ſhould be retained in the army; and although nothing could be more juſt or equitable, yet the miniſtry oppoſed it for this reaſon, that it threatened to deprive them of the privilege of rewarding their favourites.

A. D. 1740. The commons ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſupport of the army and navy to be laid before them, but ſcarce had they taken them into conſideration, when Sir Robert Walpole, as chancellor of the exchequer, preſented to the houſe a meſſage from his majeſty, intimating that he had ſome things under conſideration of the utmoſt importance, that would be attended with greater expence than he imagined, and therefore prayed that ſuch ſums as were neceſſary ſhould be granted. This was referred to the committee of ſupply, and the whole was granted with very little oppoſition.

The next thing that engaged the attention of the houſe, was a bill brought in by Sir Charles Wager, for taking an exact number of all ſeamen in the merchants ſervice, together with ſuch as plied on the river. But however neceſſary ſuch a ſtep might be, in order to know the internal ſtrength of the nation, yet the popular party treated it as a meaſure that would, in the end, enſlave the people, and therefore the bill was rejected by a very great majority. The whole conduct of the antiminiſterial party, on this occaſion, ſhewed that they acted from motives of oppoſition, becauſe the bill had not originated from themſelves.

His majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them that he intended to marry his daughter, the princeſs Mary, to the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; and prayed that they would enable him to give her a portion ſuitable to her rank. The commons unanimouſly agreed to give the princeſs forty thouſand pounds; and, at the ſame time, agreed, that an addreſs of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, for having communicated to them his royal intention.

The beginning of this year was remarkable for one of the ſevereſt froſts that had been known. It began on Chriſtmas-day 1739, and continued, without intermiſſion, upwards of ſeven weeks. The Thames was frozen over in ſuch a manner, that a public fair was held on it, and booths erected for the reception of all thoſe whoſe curioſity led them thither. The hardſhips of the poor were extremely great; but, to the everlaſting honour of the Engliſh, let it be recorded, that they did every thing in their power to alleviate the diſtreſſes of their ſuffering fellow-ſubjects. From the king, down to the humble tradeſman, each ſeemed anxious to be moſt forward in acts of benevolence; ſo that a national calamity revived decaying charity.

His majeſty, on the twenty-fifth of April, went to the houſe of peers, and, in a ſpeech from the throne, thanked the commons for their readineſs in granting the ſupplies; and recommended unanimity, as the only ſure means of making them formidable to their enemies. He added, that the juſtice of his cauſe in taking up arms, gave him reaſon to hope for the divine bleſſing; after which the parliament was prorogued to the third of June.

The king ſet out for Hanover in the beginning of May; and during his abſence, the princeſs Mary was married, by proxy, to the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. John, duke of Argyle, being offended with ſome of the meaſures of government, reſigned all his places, and retired to live in a private manner. But it is now neceſſary that we ſhould look back to the ſtate of the war.

Admiral Vernon having ſailed from Portſmouth, came to an anchor at Port-Royal in Jamaica; and ſent an account of his buſineſs to Mr. Trelawney, the governor, deſiring him to grant him all the aſſiſtance he could; and, at the ſame time, promiſing, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to diſcharge his duty according to the nature of his inſtructions. At Port-Royal the admiral was joined by commodore Brown, with one ſhip only; and having procured intelligence that the Spaniſh fleet intended ſailing towards Porto Bello, he reſolved, if poſſible, to be there before them. The fleet under admiral Vernon, with which he propoſed taking Porto Bello, conſiſted of ſix ſhips only, having on board two thouſand four hundred and ninety-five ſeamen, and two hundred land forces.

Porto Bello is ſituated on the iſthmus of Darien, where a ſmall track of land divides North and South America from each other. It conſiſts of ſeveral ſtrong forts, and is the place to which all the riches of Mexico and Peru are annually brought. The Spaniards had been at great expence in making additions to the fortifications, and they even imagined that it was impregnable. One battery of guns, level with the ſurface of the water, ſeemed to threaten deſtruction to every ſhip that approached; but abilities, courage, and perſeverance, overcome the greateſt difficulties.

On the twenty-firſt of October 1739, the ſquadron came up to the fort; but the wind being eaſterly, little could be done beſides attacking the Iron Caſtle, near the mouth of the harbour.

The attack was begun by commodore Brown, in the Hampton-Court, of ſeventy guns; and in the ſpace of twenty-five minutes, four hundred ſhot were fired. Such an inceſſant fire, which was ſeconded by captain Mayne, in the Worceſter, obliged many of the Spaniards to retire from different parts of the fort: upon which the admiral made the ſignal for the boats to come up, in order to land the marines, which was done with the loſs of three men only. As the courage of ſeamen and ſoldiers never ſhines with more luſtre than when oppoſed by the enemy, and expoſed to the greateſt dangers; ſo no ſooner had they landed, than they ſcaled the walls by one man's ſtanding on the ſhoulders of another. This ſtruck ſuch terror into the Spaniards, that both officers and men fled from the lower forts into the uppermoſt part of the citadel, where they hung out a white flag, as a ſignal that they would capitulate. The marines and ſeamen, who had firſt landed, were ſo impatient to obtain the victory, that ſtriking down the Spaniſh colours, they hoiſted thoſe of Britain; while ſuch of the Spaniſh ſoldiers as beheld their courage, ſurrendered priſoners at diſcretion. Two Spaniſh men of war lying in the harbour ſurrendered at the ſame time; ſo that, in the ſpace of one day, this great fort was taken.

News of this important event was brought to England by captain Rentone on the thirteenth of March 1740, while the parliament was ſitting; and ſo much elevated were the people in general, that medals of all ſorts were ſtruck, and great rejoicings made throughout the kingdom.

Having forced the governor of Panama to deliver up ſuch of the Engliſh as had been illegally confined, the admiral ſet ſail for Jamaica, where he came to an anchor in the harbour of Port-Royal, though not without great damage to his ſhip, which had been attacked by a violent ſtorm.

While admiral Vernon was ſupporting the honour and intereſt of his country in the Weſt-Indies, admiral Haddock, after cruiſing ſome time in the Mediterranean, blocked up the Spaniſh fleet in the harbour of Cadiz. But here admiral Haddock was led into a ſnare; for another Spaniſh fleet, under the command of admiral Pintado, made a feint, as if they intended ſailing towards Minorca; and Haddock leaving his ſtation to oppoſe them, the Spaniſh fleet got out of the harbour of Cadiz, and joined another ſquadron then lying in the harbour of Ferrol.

The French, who had hitherto concealed their intentions, began to pull off the maſk; for they fitted out a ſtrong ſquadron, under the command of the marquis D'Antin, which ſailed to Martinico, with poſitive orders to act offenſively againſt the Engliſh. Indeed our valuable ſettlements in America had long been an object of envy to our haughty neighbours; and therefore it was reſolved that, in concert with Spain, we ſhould be deprived of all the benefits of trade in that part of the world.

No ſooner was the news made public, that the French had fitted out a ſquadron, than our miniſtry, who had no ſuſpicion of any ſuch intentions, were perplexed in their minds; while the nation was filled with diſcontent from the one end to the other.

The miniſtry, in order to quiet the diſcontents of the people, ordered a large ſquadron of ſhips of the line to rendezvous at Spithead, under the command of Sir John Norris, who hoiſted his flag on board the Victory, a ſhip carrying one hundred and ten guns. The late duke of Cumberland went as a volunteer along with the admiral, and great hopes were formed by the people concerning the ſucceſs of this armament, but all in vain; for after cruiſing ſome time, and meeting with ſtorms, Sir John came to an anchor at Spithead, without having done any thing beſides amuſing the people, who had ſo generouſly ſubmitted to very heavy taxes towards ſupporting the war. This was the moſt unpopular meaſure that could have been taken; and the miniſtry, in order to regain their loſt credit, reſolved to fit out a ſquadron under captain Anſon; for the ſcheme projected the former year, of ſending him and captain Cornwall to the South-ſeas, had been partly laid aſide.

Mr. Anſon, now made commodore, was ordered to ſail, with the following ſhips under his command, namely, the Centurion, of ſixty guns; the Severn and Glouceſter, of fifty guns each; the Pearl, of forty; and the Wager, of twenty-eight; with the Trial ſloop, carrying eight guns; and two victualling veſſels. This ſcheme was well projected; and although it did not, in every thing, anſwer the hopes that had been formed of it, yet, in the end, the commodore received immortal honour, and riches were brought into the nation. His orders were to ſail to the South-ſeas, and diſtreſs the Spaniards in their remote ſettlements, ſo as to prevent them from oppoſing admiral Vernon, who ſtill remained as commander in chief in the Weſt-Indies.

On the twenty-firſt of October, this ſmall ſquadron arrived at Madeira, where they took freſh proviſions, and then paſſed Cape Horn, though not without conſiderable loſs; for many of the ſeamen died, while others were confined to their hammocks in a moſt ſickly condition.

In the mean time, admiral Torres, who commanded the Spaniſh fleet in the bay of Ferrol, ſailed for America, with two thouſand land forces on board; which ſtruck ſuch a panic into the Engliſh miniſtry, that they ſaw no appearance of keeping their ground, unleſs a fleet was ſent to reinforce the ſquadron under admiral Vernon. That brave commander, upon his return to Port-Royal, having refitted his ſhips, and taken in freſh proviſions, ſailed for Carthagena, which he bombarded, and did conſiderable damage to the place; but not having ſufficient force, and many of the men being ſickly, he was obliged to return to Porto Bello, where having again refitted, he attacked fort Chagre, and obliged the garriſon to capitulate. In the letters ſent to the miniſtry by admiral Vernon, he complained that neceſſary reinforcements had not been ſent him in proper time, ſo that no beneficial conſequences could ariſe from his victories; and however ſecret theſe letters were kept, yet the contents of them tranſpired, and the nation was again filled with diſcontent.

This induced, or rather forced, the miniſtry to ſend over to the admiral ſix regiments of marines, with two of foot, the whole under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of great courage and reſolution. Sir Chaloner Ogle was ordered to ſail from Spithead with twenty-one ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips, having on board twelve thouſand ſeamen, furniſhed with every thing neceſſary to diſtreſs the enemy. But notwithſtanding all theſe preparations, carried on at a great expence, yet the fleet did not ſail till October; ſo that the Spaniards had time to put their forts in a proper ſtate of defence.

This year Charles VI. emperor of Germany, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by his daughter Maria Thereſa, who had ſome years before married the grand duke of Tuſcany, of the houſe of Lorrain. The king of Pruſſia died much about the ſame time, and his death was ſucceeded by that of the Czarina Anne Iwanowna, empreſs of Ruſſia. The death of ſo many ſovereigns could not fail of being attended with ſuch conſequences as muſt always happen on ſimilar occaſions, namely, that of lighting up the flames of civil war. The young king of Pruſſia laid claim to the province of Sileſia, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria; and a revolution took place in Ruſſia, by which Elizabeth, the late empreſs, was placed on the throne, amidſt the united acclamations of the people.

In September, his majeſty arrived from Hanover; and on the eighteenth of November following, he aſſembled the parliament. In his ſpeech he took notice, that the Spaniards, ſenſible that they were not able to oppoſe the Britiſh forces, had called in the aſſiſtance of ſome other powers, as appeared from ſome very extraordinary ſteps that had lately been taken, by which he meant the fleet fitted out by the French. He added, that if, contrary to the faith of treaties, and inconſiſtent with the laws of nations, any power whatever ſhould take part with the Spaniards, the honour of his crown and the ſafety of the people would require every neceſſary aſſiſtance from the commons. He took notice of the death of the emperor, and how far it was likely to affect the peace of Europe: and concluded with recommending unanimity among the members.

As ſoon as his majeſty had left the houſe, and the commons were returned to their own houſe, John, duke of Argyle, moved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to congratulate him upon his ſafe return, and to aſſure him that the peers would not only ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes, but that they would exert thoſe inherent privileges enjoyed by them as the higheſt tribunal in the nation, by promoting the honour, intereſt, and happineſs of his majeſty and the kingdom. His grace, in his ſpeech, in order to enforce the motion, arraigned the conduct of the miniſtry, in not attending to the intereſt of the nation; and, in expreſs terms, accuſed them with having given private orders, that none of our ſhips ſhould attack any of the Spaniſh forts. He charged them with neglecting to give orders for the fleet to ſail; and intimated, it would have ſtill remained at Spithead, had not his majeſty returned to England.

The nervous eloquence of the duke attracted the attention of all ſuch peers as were not attached to the miniſtry, and great debates enſued. The earl of Holderneſs obſerved, that the duke's motion was couched under vague, uncertain terms; and therefore moved, that in the addreſs his majeſty ſhould be thanked for his gracious care of his people; and that his faithful lords would ſupport him with their lives and fortunes in the execution of every treaty that he had entered into with any of the German princes. This debate was carried on with great ſtrength of argument, and in language that would have done honour to a Roman ſenate, by lord-chancellor Hardwicke, lord Harvey, lord Cholmondeley, and the earl of Holderneſs, for the miniſtry; and againſt them, by the duke of Argyle, the earl of Cheſterfield, lord Carteret, and lord Talbot. At laſt the queſtion being put, it was carried in favour of the court addreſs; ſo that the miniſtry once more triumphed over thoſe who wiſhed well to the nation.

In the houſe of commons, after a long debate, an addreſs was drawn up in very general terms; and, indeed, too general, when it is conſidered in what ſtate the nation then was. That the commons might know in what condition the navy was, they moved for an addreſs to be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that all letters, or other papers ſent from admiral Vernon, ſhould be laid before them: and although it was the intereſt of the miniſter to have concealed theſe from the public, yet, by an unaccountable inadvertency, he ſuffered the motion to paſs, and the addreſs was preſented. When the letters came to be read, they were found to contain heavy complaints againſt the miniſtry, for not ſending him proper reinforcements; and that the ſhips under his command were in ſo ſhattered a condition, that they were not fit for action.

A. D. 1741. The country party, though inferior in number, were, in both houſes, the moſt reſpectable characters, and moſt juſtly celebrated for their eloquence, integrity, and diſintereſtedneſs. During the month of January this year, the minority in both houſes had frequent conſultations together, and at laſt it was reſolved to impeach the miniſter. Mr. Sandys was to manage this buſineſs in the lower houſe; and accordingly, on Friday the thirteenth of February, he ſtood up in his place, ſpoke long and ſenſibly of the many errors committed by Sir Robert, and traced his conduct as far back as the year 1720. He accuſed him with having adviſed his majeſty to do ſome things inconſiſtent with his dignity; and boldly charged him with concealing from the people the real ſtate of the nation. He took notice, that the people expected no redreſs of their grievances at home, nor ſucceſs to their arms abroad, unleſs the miniſter was for ever removed from his majeſty's councils, as well as all thoſe connected with him. He therefore moved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting that the right honourable Sir Robert Walpole, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, firſt lord-commiſſioner of the treaſury, and one of his majeſty's moſt honourable privy-council, be removed from his majeſty's councils and preſence for ever.

Mr. Pitt ſpoke long and forcibly in favour of the motion; and he was ſupported by Sir John Barnard, Mr. Pulteney, Sir John Hynde Cotton, lord Limerick, and Mr. Gibſon, gentlemen of the greateſt abilities and integrity. Theſe celebrated ſtateſmen charged the miniſter with the moſt bare-faced acts of corruption, in order to ſupport his own intereſt; and that he had, in the moſt unneceſſary manner, raiſed a ſtanding army, which was ſupported at a vaſt expence, while the navy, the real ſtrength and ſecurity of the nation, had been neglected. They concluded by aſſerting, that he had impoſed on his majeſty with reſpect to the ſtate of Europe in general; and that he had concealed from him the complaints of his people.

Such was the nature of the charge exhibited againſt the miniſter, and it muſt be acknowledged, that it was not ill founded. He had long acted on a ſyſtem of policy inconſiſtent with the intereſt of a free people; and corruption was, by his influence, carried to an enormous height.

Mr. Pelham, brother to the late duke of Newcaſtle, attempted to vindicate the whole conduct of the miniſter, and to refute the charges brought againſt him. He took notice, that all the treaties entered into by advice of the miniſter, were in conſequence of ſome defects in former ones; and that the ſtate of the nation required that his majeſty ſhould form the moſt powerful connection with the princes on the continent. He added, that the corruption with which the miniſter was charged, could not be proved; and that the whole of the charge was the effect of envy, becauſe his majeſty had diſtinguiſhed him with particular marks of his confidence and favour. In a word, Mr. Pelham did all he could to vindicate the miniſter, whoſe friend he had long been, and who continued firm to his intereſt, even to the laſt.

During the debate, which laſted till three o'clock in the morning, the miniſter ſaid not one word; but when the ſpeakers had gone through with their arguments, he ſtood up, and ſpoke in his own defence in the moſt maſterly and eloquent manner. Although conſcious that one half of the ſeats in the houſe had been given by him to ſuch needy wretches as ſubſiſted by the wages of corruption, yet ſo little was he afraid that they would expoſe his character, that he boldly charged the whole houſe to produce one inſtance of his having bribed one member, either directly or indirectly. He concluded by ſaying, that patriotiſm was a moſt venerable word, when underſtood in a proper manner; but it was then ſo hackneyed, that it had fallen into diſgrace. "The form, (ſaid he) is preſerved, but the ſubſtance is loſt. Patriots ſpring up like muſhrooms; I could make fifty of them within the compaſs of a night. Let a miniſter only refuſe an unreaſonable, or an inſolent demand, and up ſtarts a patriot: I never was afraid of making patriots, and I deſpiſe all that they can do. I believe that no miniſter ever had ſuch an attack made upon him as the preſent; but I know it has been long forming; and there are gentlemen here preſent who know that I could have prevented it, and by means not difficult to be known. I am convinced of my own integrity; and whatever may be the iſſue of the preſent motion, I ſhall rejoice in it. The whole of my life has been one continued act of duty to my country; and I here defy my moſt inveterate enemies to prove one ſingle charge which they have, with ſo much art and appearance of ſincerity, exhibited againſt me."

The miniſter having finiſhed his harangue, the queſtion was put, and carried in the negative by a ſmall majority, in conſequence of above ſixty of thoſe who pretended to be of the popular party having gone out.

In the houſe of lords, the ſame motion was made by lord Carteret, who was ſeconded by the dukes of Argyle and Bedford, the earls of Halifax, Carliſle, Berkſhire, Abingdon, and Weſtmoreland, with the lords Bathurſt and Haverſham. On the other hand, the conduct of the miniſter was vindicated by the dukes of Devonſhire and Newcaſtle, the lord-chancellor Hardwicke, the earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyle, lord Harvey, the earl of Oxford, and the biſhop of Saliſbury. The queſtion at laſt being put, it was carried in the negative. But altho' the miniſter was ſo ſucceſsful, yet, from that time, his character began to ſink; for ſo many iniquitous practices had been laid open, that although ſome of them, through the force of prejudice, and the heat of paſſion, had been conſiderably exaggerated, yet the ſober, thinking members, were convinced that the greater part were too well founded to admit of a ſingle doubt.

The death of the emperor had led his daughter, the queen of Hungary, into a war with the elector of Bavaria, who had married the daughter of the emperor Joſeph, and, in conſequence of that alliance, laid claim to ſome of the Auſtrian dominions. The queen of Hungary demanded from Britain twelve thouſand men that had been promiſed her in conſequence of a former treaty; and his majeſty, in the beginning of April, went to the houſe, and informed the parliament of it. He took notice, that he was bound to ſupport his ally; and as the war would be attended with a very great expence, he doubted not but the commons would contribute chearfully to enable him to ſupport the dignity of his crown, and force his enemies to hearken to the voice of reaſon. Both houſes joined to addreſs the king in the moſt loyal manner; telling him, that they would enable him to fulfil his engagements with the queen of Hungary, and furniſh the neceſſary ſupplies for protecting his German dominions from any attacks that might be made upon them by any power whatever. After which, the king having advanced ſome of the commoners to the peerage, he diſſolved the parliament. and in May ſet out to viſit Hanover.

The parliamentary buſineſs for the ſeaſon being thus over, it is neceſſary that we ſhould attend to the ſtate of the navy, and the operations of the fleet. Sir Chaloner Ogle, after meeting with ſeveral ſtorms, came to an anchor at the iſland of St. Dominica, where lord Cathcart died, to the inexpreſſible grief of the army and navy. The command of the forces devolved upon general Wentworth; and the admiral having taken in freſh water, and other neceſſary proviſions, ſet ſail for Jamaica, in order to join admiral Vernon. In his way thither, he fell in with a part of the French fleet, that had been ſent to aſſiſt the Spaniards, and a ſmart engagement enſued; but as war was not then declared between France and England, both admirals thought proper to deſiſt: and on the ninth of January, Sir Chaloner Ogle arrived ſafe in the harbour of Port-Royal in Jamaica. This revived the drooping ſpirits of admiral Vernon; for the fleet now amounted to twenty-nine ſhips, with fifteen thouſand ſeamen, with an equal number of land-forces. Indeed the loſs of lord Catheart was ſincerely lamented; but as general Wentworth was conſidered as an officer of the moſt undaunted courage, rage, great hopes were formed of the ſucceſs that would follow.

A council of war was immediately held at Spaniſh town in Jamaica, wherein it was reſolved, that the fleet ſhould ſail towards Hiſpaniola, to obſerve the motions of the marquis d'Antin, who was ſuppoſed to act in concert with the Spaniards; but the marquis had ſailed for Europe in a moſt diſtreſſed condition. This diſappointment occaſioned another council of war to be held, wherein it was reſolved to ſail to Carthagena, and attack that fort both by ſea and land. Accordingly, after a dangerous voyage, the Engliſh forces were landed on a ſmall iſland near the mouth of the harbour, where they erected a battery; and ſoon made a breach in the principal fort; while the fleet co-operated with them, and general Wentworth reſolved to enter the breach that had been made. At firſt every thing ſeemed to ſecond their operations, for the Spaniards abandoned the forts, and the Engliſh land forces ſeemed to carry every thing before them. But unfortunately, a miſunderſtanding having ariſen between the admiral and the general, neither would act in a proper manner, while the men, who were obliged to lay during the nights in the fields, expoſed to all the inclemencies of the weather, died in great numbers; ſo that their ſtrength was weakened, and it was feared they would become an eaſy prey to the enemy.

General Wentworth, in order to recover his loſt credit as a military officer, reſolved to take the place by ſtorm; but above ſix hundred of his men were cut off, and all hopes of ſucceeding vaniſhed. To complete the misfortune, the greateſt part of the army lay ſick, and it was computed that no leſs than three thouſand four hundred and forty men died in the ſpace of two days, merely in conſequence of the miſunderſtanding that had taken place among the commanders.

A council of war was again called, wherein each officer upbraided the other with not having done their duty; but during their debates the public ſervice was neglected and the enemy left to triumph over our weakneſs. At laſt it was reſolved to ſail for Jamaica, which was effected without any obſtacle; but no ſooner was the news tranſmitted to England, than the people were filled with the utmoſt conſternation. All Europe waited with impatience for the event of this expedition, which had coſt Britain ſo much money; and the Spaniards had given up their territories in South America for loſt, but this revived their ſpirits and enabled them to go on with the war with more ſpirit than ever, and at the ſame time it encouraged the French to give them aſſiſtance.

Whether this unfortunate affair was owing to the conduct of the admiral or the general, is of little importance to the public; but certain it is, that admiral Vernon took ſuch care of the fleet that he was conſidered as a father rather than a commander.

Having refitted the fleet, which was in a moſt ſhattered condition, and taken every proper method for preſerving the health of the ſeamen, he reſolved to attack the town of St. Jago in the iſland of Cuba. He had great hopes of ſucceeding in this enterprize, and accordingly the forces were landed; but general Wentworth ſtill oppoſed the admiral, ſo that nothing of conſequence was done, nor any honour acquired to the nation. The public money was ſquandered away in an empty parade; the people were filled with hopes, and in the end, being diſappointed, diſcontent took place every where. It is true, ſome few of the enemy's ſhips had been deſtroyed, but that was not attended with any ſucceſs worth mentioning; and after a fruitleſs attempt to bring honour to the Britiſh crown and reputation to her arms, it was reſolved to ſail to Jamaica, where the fleet arrived, though not before many of the men had loſt their lives by ſuch diſorders as are peculiar to the climate in that part of the world.

The diſgrace that attended the Britiſh navy in the Weſt Indies had a conſiderable effect on the political ſtate of Europe, according to the views of the different courts. The young king of Pruſſia, whoſe political and military talents had been hitherto concealed, demanded of the queen of Hungary the province of Sileſia, in conſequence of ſome old claims which had been given up by his anceſtors; but in all diſputes between princes, power becomes predominant. The Pruſſian army was then the beſt diſciplined in Europe, the king at their head entering Sileſia, every thing gave way to him, while the queen of Hungary, who had taken poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominions, relied for ſupport on Great Britain. Indeed the Pruſſian monarch bought his conqueſts extremely dear; for count Neuperg, having raiſed an army, a moſt bloody battle enſued at Molwitz, near the river Neiſs. For ſome time it was doubtful in whoſe favour victory would declare herſelf, till at laſt, about ſix in the evening, the king of Pruſſia, by one of thoſe maſterly ſtrokes for which his character has been ſo juſtly celebrated, obliged the Auſtrians to retire, and the town of Neiſs ſurrendered to the conqueror.

This blow, though not deciſive, threatened the Auſtrian dominions with immediate ruin; but the queen of Hungary had ſtill great hopes from the late reſolutions of the Britiſh parliament. She alſo ſollicited the aſſiſtance of the ſtates-general; but the king of Pruſſia ſent a threatening letter to the Hague, wherein he informed the ſtates, that if they took any part in the preſent war, ſo as to oppoſe him, he would ſeize on ſuch parts of their territories as his anceſtors had formerly laid claim to. To enforce his orders, he commanded a body of ſix thouſand men to encamp on the frontiers of Holland, which ſo intimidated the Dutch, that they were obliged to apply to the earl of Hyndford, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to intercede in their favour. But all theſe means proved ineffectual; for the Pruſſian monarch, finding that the court of Vienna, in concert with ſome other European powers, had entered into a confederacy againſt him, he reſolved to keep poſſeſſion of the places he had taken in Sileſia; and that he might be able to add the whole of that valuable province to his territories, he concluded a treaty offenſive and defenſive with France.

In the mean time the French, ever reſtleſs and ambitious, reſolved to humble the power of the houſe of Auſtria; and for that purpoſe made choice of the elector of Bavaria, who was intended to be made emperor, and the hereditary dominions of the queen of Hungary were to be ſettled on him and his family. Cardinal Fleury, who at that time was the chief miniſter at the court of Verſailles, was in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and a man of a moſt pacific diſpoſition; but notwithſtanding all his abilities, yet no ſooner had the French learned that the king of Pruſſia had declared in favour of the elector of Bavaria, than the whole people called out for war, and the cardinal was obliged to give way to the public clamour. The French king was ſo averſe to every meaſure that ſeemed to countenance the claims of the houſe of Auſtria, that he reſolved to place the elector of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and ſecure to himſelf ſuch of the Auſtrian provinces in the Netherlands as lay neareſt to his own dominions. This was a deep laid ſcheme, and the news of it was ſent to the marſhal de Belliſle, then in Germany, that he might be ready for carrying on the intended project.

The bad ſucceſs attending the Engliſh arms in America, gave life to every oppoſition made againſt them by any of the European powers. The marſhal de Belliſle had his army ſtrongly reinforced; and the Spaniards, eager to ſtrengthen themſelves by any alliance whatever, ſent conſiderable ſums of money to Paris to defray the expences of the war in Germany.

In order to give ſome colour to theſe hoſtile preparations, the French king publiſhed a manifeſto, wherein he aſſerted, that nothing but the ſafety of his people could have induced him to take ſuch a ſtep; but as the king of England had aſſembled an army in Germany, ſo he thought it his duty to do the ſame. In the mean time, the marſhal de Belleiſle, who acted both as general and ambaſſador, conducted matters with ſo much art, that the king of Pruſſia, with the elector of Saxony, were both brought into a general confederacy againſt the houſe of Auſtria, whoſe dominions were to be parcelled out among them. This was a treaty of ſo unjuſt and infamous a nature, that no excuſe can be made for it, becauſe it entails infamy upon every one of the parties.

The elector of Bavaria, thus powerfully ſtrengthened, took the field, and declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, whoſe whole forces, except a few in garriſons, were engaged in oppoſing thoſe of the king of Pruſſia. At firſt, the elector of Bavaria ſpread conſternation wherever he came, even to the gates of Vienna; while a large body of French troops, under the command of the marſhal Maillebois, penetrated through Weſtphalia to the frontiers of Hanover. His Britannic majeſty was then in Hanover; and his whole German forces, amounting to no more than twenty-ſix thouſand men; and the king of Pruſſia being ready with an army to ſupport the French, he found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſigning a treaty; by which it was ſtipulated, that the Hanoverian forces ſhould not take any part in the war, but obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. The queen of Hungary was now driven from Germany, and moſt of her dominions ſeized by the enemy. Denied aſſiſtance from any prince in the empire, except the elector of Hanover, and he, at the moment his army intended to march to her aſſiſtance, was obliged to ſign a treaty of neutrality. In that diſtreſſed ſituation, the queen had recourſe to methods more proper, and more advantageous than the aſſiſtance of any foreign power whatever. She aſſembled the ſtates of Hungary, a brave, warlike people, who had been ſubject to her anceſtors above ſix hundred years; and coming into the ſtate-houſe at Preſburg, ſhe held her ſon, then about ſix months old, and at preſent emperor of Germany, in her arms, and addreſſed her ſubjects, in Latin, to the following import.

She told them, that her moſt unhappy circumſtances, as they then were, left her no reaſon to hope that ſhe could ever extricate herſelf out of ſuch difficulties, unleſs ſhe was aſſiſted in the moſt powerful manner. She added, that ſhe was abandoned by her friends, perſecuted by her enemies, and that even her own relations had conſpired againſt her. "I have "none to truſt to but you, my dear and loyal ſub"jects. Here is your king in my arms; to you I "commit both him and myſelf, not doubting but "you will ſupport me in oppoſing my enemies: "and if I ſhould be ſo unfortunate as to loſe all in "Germany, I ſhall once more throw myſelf into the "arms of my Hungarian ſubjects." This ſpeech, delivered in the moſt tender and pathetic manner, had the deſired effect. Many ladies in the hall ſhed tears; but the brave deputies drawing their ſwords, called out, "Moriamur pro rege Maria-Thereſa:" "We will die for our king Maria-Thereſa;" for the Hungarians always ſpeak of their ſovereigns in the maſculine gender.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the zeal that her loyal ſubjects exerted on the preſent occaſion: there ſeemed to be a conteſt among them who ſhould be the firſt to aſſiſt their diſtreſſed ſovereign; and in the compaſs of a few weeks, an army of thirty thouſand men, under the command of count Palſy, an old experienced general, was ſent to the relief of Vienna. Prince Charles of Lorrain, the favourite of the Auſtrian army, had raiſed ſome forces, in concert with his brother the grand duke of Tuſcany; and ſeveral other ſmall armies continued to protect ſome of the moſt important towns in Bohemia; and a variety of circumſtances ſeemed to concur towards extricating the queen of Hungary out of her numerous difficulties, and turning the intended miſchief upon her enemies.

Cardinal de Fleury, ever attentive to the intereſts of his country, and well acquainted with the internal power of Great-Britain, left nothing undone to perſuade the French king to adopt the moſt pacific meaſures; and finding his opinion over-ruled, he was ſo dilatory in ſending proviſions and ammunition to the army in Germany, that the marſhal de Belleiſle found himſelf reduced to great hardſhips. Nor was the elector of Bavaria in much better circumſtances. Inſtead of attacking Vienna, which would undoubtedly have ſurrendered, he ſpent his time in the moſt dilatory manner; while Khevenhuller, the braveſt of the Auſtrian generals, did not fail to take every advantage, in order to recover ſuch places as had been taken from his royal miſtreſs. But the elector of Saxony, who owed the crown of Poland to the late emperor, joined his whole army to that of the French and Bavarians; and marching to Prague, the capital of Bohemia, it was inveſted with ſuch fury, that the whole garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war; while the grand duke, who was marching to its relief, found himſelf under the neceſſity of retiring more to the ſouthward.

Prince Charles of Lorrain, who commanded under his brother the grand duke, propoſed that the army ſhould be divided into three bodies, viz. one under the grand duke, a ſecond under prince Lobkowitz, and a third under Khevenhuller. Several advantages were obtained by theſe different armies, but the moſt important was that by Khevenhuller, who defeated the general Segur, who commanded for the elector of Bavaria; and afterwards being joined by the army under the grand duke, he attacked the city of Lintz, the capital of the Upper Auſtria, and the garriſon was obliged to capitulate.

The court of France, eager to purſue the meaſures already taken, proceeded with ſuch celerity, that the elector of Bavaria was crowned emperor, little oppoſition being made to his title. But this ſtep was trifling to what the French had in view: for as they had reſolved not to leave the queen of Hungary in poſſeſſion of one ſingle province, an ambaſſador was ſent to the Grand Signior, to inform him that he had now an opportunity of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, and annexing to his European dominions the ancient kingdom of Hungary.

This was a meaſure the queen of Hungary had not foreſeen; and therefore, as ſoon as the news of it was communicated to her, ſhe was filled with the utmoſt conſternation. However, her natural fortitude, and a preſence of mind for which ſhe had been always diſtinguiſhed, ſupported her drooping ſpirits; and ſhe wrote a letter, with her own hand, to the Grand Signior, wherein ſhe mentioned the diſtreſſed ſituation to which ſhe was reduced; and begging that, conſiſtent with the character of an heroic prince, he would not avail himſelf of circumſtances that could not, in the end, produce any real advantage.

The pope gave the queen leave to claim one tenth of the revenues of all eccleſiaſtical benefices within her dominions: and the empreſs of Ruſſia intended to have aſſiſted her, but the French ſtirred up the Swedes to declare war againſt that princeſs. The Swedes accordingly entered the province of Livonia, and took ſome of the moſt important places; but the Ruſſians at laſt drove them from their territories. This was ſucceeded by a revolution in Peterſburgh, by which the empreſs was depoſed, and Elizabeth, the daughter of Peter the Great, elected empreſs in her room.

This revolution, however ſudden and unexpected, did not diſconcert any meaſures taken by the queen of Hungary, in order to ſecure her honour and intereſt. General Berner, who commanded for her in Auſtria, made an irruption into Bavaria, where he deſtroyed ſeveral of the French magazines, and obliged the garriſons of Iſchel and Hallſtadt to ſubmit, as priſoners of war. This maſterly ſtroke opened a paſſage for the Auſtrian army into the center of Bavaria; and, upon the whole, the campaign was finiſhed much to the advantage of the queen of Hungary. The French had tried every method to bring over the king of Sardinia to their intereſt, but in vain; for that prince was extremely jealous of the Spaniards or French getting footing in Italy. Genoa, indeed, declared againſt the queen of Hungary; and the kingdom of Naples being, in a manner, dependent on Spain, and Spain directed by French councils, it was no difficult matter to perſuade the court of Madrid to ſend a body of forces into Italy; and before admiral Haddock could come up with them, they were joined by the French fleet in the harbour of Toulon.

In the latter end of October, his majeſty returned to England; and on the firſt of December, the new parliament met at Weſtminſter. During the election for new members, the minority acquired conſiderable advantages, in conſequence of the neglect of the miniſter, who ſtill conſidered himſelf as ſure of a majority that would ſupport his meaſures, and ſcreen him from cenſure. This had induced him to neglect his common practices of corrupting electors; ſo that his ruin ſeemed not far diſtant.

His majeſty, in his ſpeech, told the members, that he had entered into the preſent war with Spain by their advice and concurrence; and that, with reſpect to the confederacy that had been formed againſt the queen of Hungary, it was too well known to the nation in general, for him to deſcend to particulars: that, conſiſtent with the advice of his parliament, he had done every thing in his power to ſupport that unfortunate princeſs, by ſtriving to diſſolve ſuch connections as had been formed againſt her; but as he had hitherto been unſucceſsful, he doubted not but his parliament would enable him to purſue ſuch meaſures as would bring the war to a happy concluſion.

The commons being returned to their own houſe, Mr. Herbert, afterwards earl of Powis, moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, which was ſeconded by ſome other members: but lord Noel Somerſet having propoſed, that it ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, that Britain ſhould not be involved in a war, in order to preſerve his majeſty's dominions in Germany, a long debate enſued, in which it appeared evident that the miniſter had loſt much of that ſuperiority which he had hitherto maintained over the houſe. At laſt a formal, though very bold addreſs, was agreed to; but no ſooner was it preſented, than the miniſter was blamed for not exerting himſelf with more ſpirit, which, in reality, he might have done; but he ſeemed to be altogether infatuated.

For ſome years, there had been a miſunderſtanding between the king and the prince of Wales, who, on many accounts, was beloved by the people: and the miniſter laying hold of this circumſtance, reſolved to make up the breach, and ſo reconcile himſelf to both. Dr. Secker, then biſhop of Oxford, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, was employed, on this occaſion, as a mediator. But the prince deſired him to inform his majeſty, that however willing and deſirous he was to regain his long loſt favour, he would not countenance any meaſure of government till the miniſter was removed.

A. D. 1742. This was the laſt blow given to the power of the miniſter; for, on the third of February, his majeſty adjourned both houſes of parliament to the eighteenth; and, in the mean time, Sir Robert Walpole was created earl of Orford, and reſigned all his employments. The prince of Wales was, ſoon after, reconciled to his royal father, and a guard appointed to attend him at Carlton-houſe; while ſome of the principal perſons in the oppoſition were advanced to the higheſt employments: but ſtill the influence of Sir Robert ſeemed to operate on the miniſtry; and his removal from his places was looked upon in no other light than as a ſham contrivance to amuſe the nation.

On the eighteenth of February, the parliament met, according to the time mentioned in their laſt adjournment; and petitions were preſented to them from the merchants of the moſt eminent trading towns in the nation, complaining that their goods had been taken by the enemy, becauſe the miniſtry had neglected to ſend out force ſufficient to protect them. This induced the houſe to reſolve itſelf into a committee, to conſider of the nature of theſe grievances; and the people in general began to hope for redreſs, when they found that the miniſter, who had ſo long been the object of their reſentment, was removed from the council. But theſe hopes ſoon vaniſhed; for many of thoſe who had ſo violently oppoſed the miniſtry, no ſooner found themſelves inveſted with power, than they reſolved to gratify their avarice and ambition, by acting on the ſame principles with him. Diſputes aroſe among them, which were agitated with great heat on both ſides, while the intereſt of the nation was, in a manner, totally neglected. Some were for calling the late miniſter to an account for his conduct; but others oppoſed it, becauſe the profits that he had formerly enjoyed were now divided among themſelves. The nation in general cried out againſt him, and were ſupported in the houſe by ſuch diſcontented members as had not been advanced to places in conſequence of the late change; but he was powerfully ſupported by many of thoſe who had formerly been his moſt inveterate enemies.

Motions were made in the houſe of commons to repeal the act for ſeptennial parliaments, and likewiſe the penſion-bill; but both theſe paſſed in the negative, although ſupported by a powerful party. This began to open the eyes of the people; for as theſe two points were the principal objects the patriots pretended to have in view, and as their number had been conſiderably increaſed at the laſt general election, it was not doubted but they would have carried both the motions: but they were miſtaken; for thoſe who had appeared moſt forward while Sir Robert was at the head of affairs, now did all in their power to oppoſe every meaſure that tended towards promoting the intereſt and ſecurity of the nation. In a word, the people loſt all confidence in their repreſentatives; they had changed men, but the ſame meaſures were purſued. Thoſe who had been the ſtrongeſt in the oppoſition, were brought over by penſions, or allured by titles; among whom was the famous Mr. Pulteney, who had ſo long diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the houſe of commons. He was created earl of Bath, and gratified with a large part of the crown lands; but from that moment his popularity ſunk into contempt.

It is now time that we ſhould return to the continent, and conſider the operations of war, which the Britiſh nation had ſo liberally contributed towards ſupporting. The earl of Stair, a man equally acquainted with war and politics, had been appointed commander in chief of the army, in the room of John duke of Argyle, who had reſigned all his employments; and early in the ſpring that nobleman went over to the Hague, to try if he could bring the united provinces to declare in favour of the queen of Hungary. But although he was a man of the greateſt addreſs, and well acquainted with the paſſions of ſtateſmen, yet he found it impoſſible to bring over the Dutch to our meaſures. Accordingly he was recalled, and lord Carteret ſent in his room. The troops that had been raiſed in England for the ſervice of the queen of Hungary, embarked for Flanders the latter end of April, under the command of the earl of Stair. They were to be joined by twenty-five thouſand Hanoverians, and ſix thouſand Heſſians, who had been taken into the pay of Great-Britain. But things took a different turn from what was expected, as will appear in the courſe of this work.

The king of Sardinia was convinced that he muſt ſtand or fall with the houſe of Auſtria; and therefore, as ſoon as he heard of the alteration that had taken place in the Britiſh miniſtry; he reſolved to join his forces to thoſe of the queen of Hungary. The French were terribly alarmed at this reſolution of his Sardinian majeſty; and as they doubted not but their harbours would be viſited by the Britiſh fleets, they reſolved to put their navy on a proper footing. The Auſtrian arms, ſtill attended with more ſucceſs than could have been expected, penetrated into the center of Bavaria, and Munich, the capital city of that electorate, ſurrendered to them. The queen of Hungary, no ſtranger with reſpect to the moſt proper methods to be uſed in order to acquire the eſteem and ſecure the affections of her army, wrote a letter to general Khevenhuller, deſiring him to thank the ſoldiers in her name, and to preſent them with the pictures of herſelf and her ſon Joſeph. No ſooner were the pictures ſhewn to the army, than they ſeemed fired with enthuſiaſm in favour of their ſovereign; and their whole conduct, during the remainder of the war, was a convincing proof of their loyalty.

The critical ſtate of affairs in Bavaria induced the French to ſend a freſh reinforcement thither, in order to drive the Auſtrians from Munich; upon which the garriſon, being afraid that they would be taken priſoners, abandoned the place: but before the French could march thither, it was retaken by a large body of Auſtrians. General Khevenhuller finding that another body of French, under the command of duke Harcourt, were marching to oppoſe him, quitted the city of Munich; and, in order to ſecure a retreat, threw a bridge acroſs the Danube. Both armies came to an engagement near the banks of the Danube, where the Bavarians were defeated with conſiderable loſs: but prince Maurice of Saxony, afterwards known by the name of Marſhal Saxe, took the town of Egra; while Glatz, and ſome other towns in Sileſia, being greatly reduced for want of proviſions, and having loſt many of their men, were obliged to ſurrender to the king of Pruſſia, who ſeemed to carry every thing before him.

The army under the command of prince Charles of Lorrain amounted to upwards of forty thouſand men, beſides a large body of irregulars drawn from the moſt remote parts of the provinces. The Auſtrians had the greateſt confidence in prince Charles; and, in general, he was very ſucceſsful, for he prevented the king of Pruſſia from marching into Bohemia, at leaſt for ſome time. This gave freſh ſpirits to the Auſtrians; and prince Charles finding himſelf under an abſolute neceſſity of coming to a battle with the king of Pruſſia, both armies met at a place called Czaſlaw, about thirty miles eaſt from Prague. A moſt bloody engagement enſued; for both armies were nearly equal in number, and both were compoſed of as brave ſoldiers as ever took the field. The king of Pruſſia, after his men had done every thing in their power, was going to give way; but the irregulars that followed the Auſtrian army broke into the Pruſſian camp for plunder, and their example being followed by the regulars, the king embraced that opportunity to rally, and prince Charles was defeated, with the loſs of three thouſand men.

This victory might have enabled the king of Pruſſia to penetrate into the heart of Bohemia; but he began to diſcover that he could not put any confidence in the French, who had hitherto deceived him with promiſes of new reinforcements. This induced him to think of making peace with the queen of Hungary, and no time ſeemed ſo proper as when the memory of the late battle was recent in the minds of the Auſtrians. A packet, with diſpatches, had been ſent to the marſhal de Broglio, the French general, which was, by miſtake, delivered to his Pruſſian majeſty; and, upon peruſing the contents, he diſcovered that it was the intention of the French court to ſpare their army as much as poſſible, by throwing the burthen of the war upon him. In a letter to marſhal de Broglio, and in a conference with marſhal de Belleiſle, he upbraided them for not ſeconding him in his operations; but they ſtill continued to deceive him with falſe hopes. Accordingly a treaty was concluded between the king of Pruſſia and the queen of Hungary, by which the latter gave up Sileſia, with the province of Glatz in Bohemia, upon condition of his withdrawing his forces, and obſerving a ſtrict neutrality. The elector of Saxony made peace with the queen of Hungary at the ſame time; ſo that the French were deprived of two of their allies, and the emperor was left expoſed to the whole power of the Auſtrian army.

Prince Charles, immediately after the battle of Czaſlaw, marched towards Budweis, where he was joined by prince Lobkowitz, and their united army amounted to ſixty thouſand men. Thus reinforced, prince Charles croſſed the Moldaw, and attacked a body of French under the command of M. de Aubigné, and put them to flight. He purſued and haraſſed them ſo much, that their loſs was equal to a defeat in a general engagement. The huſſars pillaged the French of their baggage; and ſuch of the ſoldiers as happened to ſtray from the main body, were murdered by the peaſants. In the mean time, the marſhal de Broglio came up with a body of forces to oppoſe prince Charles, who was on the point of cutting off the whole French army; but nothing could re-animate the drooping ſpirits of his army; and they were ſo much ſtruck with terror, that they never looked behind them till they came under the walls of Prague. Here they were joined by the army under the command of marſhal de Belleiſle, and both generals reſolved to concert the moſt proper methods for oppoſing prince Charles. As ſoon as prince Charles came within ſight of the French at Prague, he encamped his men, and next day he was joined by his brother, the grand duke.

The marſhal de Belleiſle was now ſo much diſtracted concerning what means he could uſe to preſerve his army, that he offered to give up Prague upon condition that his men were allowed to depart, unmoleſted, out of Bohemia; but all the anſwer they received was, they muſt ſurrender priſoners of war. This would have been a fatal ſtroke to France; and had it taken place, their whole ſcheme would have been defeated; ſo that there remained nothing to be done but to defend the place to the laſt extremity; and, in conſequence thereof, one of the moſt remarkable ſieges took place that we meet with in hiſtory.

On the twenty-eighth of July, the trenches were opened; and although the Auſtrian army was more formidable in appearance than that of the French, yet the latter were better acquainted with the arts of attack and defence, and their generals behaved with the moſt intrepid ſpirit and undaunted reſolution. They knew that the ſtrongeſt enemy they had to contend with was famine, for they doubted not but the Auſtrians would hinder the peaſants from ſending in proviſions. This happened juſt as they expected; for in a ſhort time, meat was ſold for three ſhillings and ſixpence a pound, and horſe fleſh was eaten by many of the gentry. Forage was ſo ſcarce, that fourteen thouſand horſes were either killed or turned looſe, while the French officers gave every thing they had to purchaſe proviſions for the ſoldiers.

On the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, the marſhal de Belleiſle made a ſally, at the head of twelve thouſand men, drove the Auſtrians from their works, filled up ſome of the entrenchments, and took general Monty priſoner, beſides killing fifteen hundred men.

Nor was the bravery of the Auſtrians leſs conſpicuous; for prince Charles and the grand duke expoſed their perſons on every occaſion, in order to animate the ſoldiers. Cardinal Fleury, who had the utmoſt averſion to war, propoſed bringing about an accommodation, and deſired the king of Great-Britain to become a mediator; but his late majeſty knew that no confidence could be placed in any propoſal made by the cardinal, and therefore rejected his overtures with diſdain. Finding himſelf baffled in this undertaking, he wrote a letter to the Auſtrian generals, wherein he informed them, that he had oppoſed the war, but was over-ruled by the king and marſhal de Belleiſle: and this letter, which made a conſiderable noiſe, was publiſhed at Vienna.

It is not conſiſtent with the plan of this work to deſcend to every particular that happened during this memorable ſiege. There were in the city, beſides the French army, at leaſt one hundred thouſand inhabitants, whoſe diſtreſs was beyond deſcription, nor was there a poſſibility of relieving them. The marquis de Fenelon, then ambaſſador at the Hague, propoſed that the army under the command of the marſhal Maillebois ſhould be ſent to relieve Prague; for France had been, in a manner, exhauſted both of men and money. This propoſal was ſtrongly oppoſed by the cardinal, who inſiſted, that if the brave army under the command of marſhal Maillebois ſhould be ſent into Bohemia, then France would be left expoſed both to England and Holland; but the marquis de Fenelon having undertaken to keep the ſtates-general from engaging in the war, the meaſure was adopted, although apparently attended with very dangerous conſequences. The emperor was averſe to this plan, becauſe his hereditary dominions were over-run by the Auſtrians; and he inſiſted, that if they were driven out of Bavaria, Prague would be relieved of courſe. Nor was Maillebois leſs averſe to this meaſure than the emperor; but the orders ſent to him being abſolute, he began his march from the Lower Rhine about the middle of Auguſt, at the head of a brave, well-diſciplined army. The duke de Harcourt was then in Bavaria, the imperialiſts were under the command of general Seckendorff, and the brave Khevenhuller watched their motions with an army of Auſtrians. But the principal object that engaged the attention of Europe was the fate of Prague.

Prince Charles of Lorrain, ever attentive to his duty as a brave officer, no ſooner heard that the marſhal Maillebois was marching againſt him, than he turned the ſiege of Prague into a blockade; and, committing the care of it to prince Lobkowitz, ſet out to meet the French, in order to prevent their marching into Bohemia. In his march he was joined by the troops under Khevenhuller, but not before the imperialiſts had, by forced marches, given them the ſlip; and, in their way towards the French camp, marſhal Saxe, become a great favourite with the army, joined them, ſo that Maillebois found himſelf ſtrongly ſupported. This junction of the three armies was entirely owing to the good conduct of count Saxe; and from that time his knowledge in military affairs ſhone with ſuch a diſtinguiſhing luſtre, that no plan of operations was laid down without firſt conſulting him.

The French marſhals, Belleiſle and Broglio, reſolving to avail themſelves of the departure of prince Charles, made ſeveral ſallies upon the Auſtrians, who were at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege; ſo that all the detached parties of each army found an opportunity of joining together in two very formidable bodies. Prince Charles finding himſelf reduced to the alternative of either venturing on a battle, the fate of which would decide the war, or leaving the kingdom of Bohemia expoſed to the French, reſolved to avail himſelf of the moſt trifling circumſtance.

The ſcarcity of proviſions had obliged the French army once more to divide itſelf into ſeparate bodies; and prince Charles, who was well acquainted with the country, reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent their joining a ſecond time. This had the deſired effect; for the French being reduced to the greateſt extremity for want of proviſions, the main body under Maillebois marched towards Bavaria, where that general was diſgraced, and the command given to marſhal Broglio, who had diſguiſed himſelf as a peaſant, to eſcape the Auſtrians, and in that manner had travelled ſeveral days without being ſuſpected.

Belleiſle, who had been obliged to return to Prague, was ſo cloſely blocked up by the Auſtrians, that he reſolved, if poſſible, to make his eſcape from a place that he was not able to defend. This ſcheme he put in practice in ſuch a maſterly manner, as muſt convince every one that he was one of the moſt accompliſhed generals of that age. He ſent out ſome ſpies, who pretended to be deſerters, and they being taken to the Auſtrian general Lobkowitz, they informed him that the marſhal, during the next night, intended to make a general ſally from a particular quarter of the town. The Auſtrians, not doubting the truth of this ſtory, drew off their forces to that quarter; and, in the mean time, marſhal de Belleiſle made his eſcape from the place, and got at leaſt a day's march from Prague before prince Lobkowitz knew any thing of his departure. Three thouſand of the French were left in Prague, and Belleiſle continued marching ten days, over ice and ſnow, before the Auſtrians could come up with him. At laſt prince Lobkowitz getting intelligence what route they had taken, came in ſight of them; but not chuſing to venture on a general engagement with men reduced to a ſtate of deſperation, he reſolved to block up ſuch paſſes as lay before them, and ſo prevent them from joining with the main body of forces in Bavaria.

But notwithſtanding the vigilance of the Auſtrian general, yet the marſhal de Belleiſle roſe ſuperior to every difficulty. He made choice of a road ſo dangerous and unfrequented, that the enemy had no notion of his ever going that way; and although he was ſo much afflicted with the rheumatiſm, that he was obliged to be carried in a ſedan, yet he gave orders in the moſt cool and deliberate manner, without ever complaining of the hardſhips he ſuffered. At laſt, after a march, over ſnow and ice, of above one hundred and fifty miles, and ſurmounting incredible difficulties, he arrived ſafe at Egra, having loſt about a thouſand men through the inclemency of the weather, but none by any other accidents whatever. The troops left by him in Prague capitulated on the ſame day that he had completed his march, and were allowed to march to Egra; ſo that this diſtreſſed city was relieved, after a ſiege of five months and ſome days.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Germany during the year 1742. But we muſt now look to Italy, where the different contending powers were uſing their utmoſt endeavours to light up the flames of war, and bring the ſmaller principalities, as well as the moſt powerful ſtates, into an alliance with them. The queen of Hungary, ſenſible that the king of Sardinia, conſiſtent with his own intereſt, could not join with France or Spain, reſolved to bring him over to her meaſures; and accordingly diſpatched an ambaſſador, for that purpoſe, to the court of Turin. But the Sardinian monarch was too cunning to enter into any negotiation till he had made propoſals to the court of London, in order to procure ſuch a ſubſidy as would defray his expences. Indeed the Engliſh miniſtry were now convinced that they ought not to keep any meaſures of a pacific nature with France: the views of that court were now fully laid open, eſpecially when it is conſidered in what manner they aſſiſted the Spaniſh fleet when it was oppoſed in the Mediterranean by admiral Haddock, whoſe orders were of ſo ambiguous a nature, that he knew not in what manner to act.

Admiral Haddock was now ſo much reduced by ſickneſs, that he found himſelf under an abſolute neceſſity of returning to England for the re-eſtabliſhment of his health; and the command of the fleet devolved upon commodore Leſtock, who had lately arrived from the Weſt-Indies.

As ſoon as the admiral had ſet ſail for England, the commodore made a proper inquiry into the ſtate of the fleet; and finding that the whole number of ſhips amounted to twenty-eight, he weighed anchor, and arrived ſafe in the harbour of Port-Mahon, in the iſland of Minorca. There he took in freſh proviſions; and having refitted ſuch of the ſhips as were damaged, he ſailed from Mahon, and appeared before the harbour of Toulon. The French, who imagined that he had come there in a hoſtile manner, were filled with conſternation, but nothing of importance was done; and, in conſequence of the change that had taken place in the Engliſh miniſtry, admiral Matthews was ſent to the Mediterranean, to take upon him the command of the fleet; and Leſtock, who had, on former occaſions, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, was raiſed to the degree of an admiral.

This ſtep, in joining theſe two admirals together, was conſidered as the moſt impolitic meaſure that could have been purſued; for there had formerly been many differences between them; and it was not doubted but they would do all in their power to croſs each other. In the mean time, admiral Matthews took care to put the fleet on the moſt reſpectable footing; and accordingly, ſoon after his arrival, he burnt ſome Spaniſh ſhips that had taken ſhelter in the bay of St. Tropez, on the coaſt of the Mediterranean. He alſo ſent commodore Martin to Naples, to demand that the king of the two Sicilies would immediately withdraw his troops from the Spaniſh army in Italy; and to ſign an agreement, that he would not give them any aſſiſtance whatever. The whole city of Naples was filled with the utmoſt conſternation at the peremptory manner in which the Engliſh admiral made his demands; but neceſſity obliged pride to give way; and the king of Sicily, conſiſtent with the duty he owed to his people, was obliged to withdraw his troops, by which the Spaniſh army was conſiderably weakened.

The Spaniards had attempted to ſend a large body of men into Italy; but although they were powerfully aſſiſted by the French, yet ſuch was the ſpirited conduct of the king of Sardinia, that he drove them back from Piedmont with very conſiderable loſs. The Auſtrians in Italy taking freſh courage from this circumſtance, returned to the dutchy of Modena, and laid all the towns under contribution. Thus every thing on the part of the queen of Hungary ſeemed to wear a moſt promiſing aſpect in Italy. The king of Sardinia was her ally; the king of Naples was prevented from doing her any injury: ſome of the ſmaller ſtates were overawed; while admiral Matthews was cruiſing in the Mediterranean, to prevent either the French or Spaniards from landing any forces.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent of Europe, the Britiſh affairs in America were in the moſt deplorable ſituation. The admiral and the commander of the land forces could never agree in any ſingle propoſal; and the time that ſhould have been devoted towards proſecuting the war, was ſpent in idle contention, the effect of paſſion and malevolence.

A reinforcement had been ſent over to admiral Vernon in the Weſt-Indies; and it was propoſed to ſail to Po to-Bello, and from thence to ſend a detachment, over the iſthmus of Darien, to Panama, the capital city of that province. Admiral Vernon was of opinion, that no time ſhould be loſt; and therefore, having anchored in the harbour of Porto-Bello, he diſpatched Mr. Lowther, an officer of the army, to bring him proper intelligence concerning the ſituation of Panama, and what force would be neceſſary to reduce it. Upon the return of Mr. Lowther, a council of war was held, wherein he gave it as his opinion, that they could not, with ſafety, attack the fort of Panama, on account of the rainy ſeaſon, and the great ſickneſs that prevailed in the army. In this he was ſeconded by the other officers of the land forces; and admiral Vernon, vexed to the utmoſt, found himſelf under the neceſſity of returning once more to Jamaica, to take in freſh proviſions, without having been able to do any thing for the ſervice of his country. So true is it, that nothing ſo much retards the progreſs of an army as differences among the commanders.

On the ſixteenth of November, the Britiſh parliament met at Weſtminſter; when the king informed them, that he had taken into his pay ſixteen thouſand Hanoverian and Heſſian forces, in order to ſtrengthen the army on the continent. He took notice of the ſtate of Europe, particularly Germany; and ſpoke in the higheſt terms concerning the magnanimous conduct of the queen of Hungary. He added, that an alliance with the queen of Hungary in the war would humble the power of France and Spain, and make Britain more reſpectable than ever. He obſerved, that although the expence of the war would be great, yet it was neceſſary; and therefore the proper eſtimates ſhould be laid before the commons, not doubting but they would contribute towards ſupporting him in the ſame chearful manner as they had hitherto done. This was what he hoped no perſon could have any reaſonable objection to; and he aſſured them, that the ſtricteſt œconomy ſhould be obſerved by himſelf.

His majeſty having left the houſe, and the commons were returned, great debates aroſe concerning the words of the addreſs that ſhould be preſented. This oppoſition was occaſioned by the conduct of the diſcontented members, who not being gratified according to their expectations, became as inveterate enemies to that miniſtry they had ſet up, as they had been to that which they pulled down. But all theſe attempts proved unſucceſsful; for both houſes preſented moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes to his majeſty, wherein they approved entirely of every part of his conduct, and thanked him for his great care in watching ſo attentively over the affairs of Europe. They aſſured him, that nothing ſhould be wanting to ſupport the dignity of his majeſty's crown, and humble his enemies in every part of the world.

The committee of ways and means took into conſideration in what manner the proper ſupplies were to be raiſed; for on the laſt day of this year, (1742) the national debt amounted to forty-eight millions, nine hundred and fifteen thouſand forty-ſeven pounds, ſixteen ſhillings and nine-pence halfpenny.

A. D. 1743. The land-tax was raiſed to four ſhillings in the pound; ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds were borrowed on exciſe-bills; eight hundred thouſand pounds were to be raiſed by a lottery; one million was taken from the ſinking fund, beſides the whole overplus of the exchequer. The whole ſum granted by parliament to defray the expences of this year, amounted to five millions, three hundred and fourteen thouſand one hundred pounds.

Motions were made to revive the place and penſion bills, and to enquire into the conduct of the earl of Orford during the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration. But although theſe motions were ſtrongly ſupported by Sir Watkyn-Williams Wynn and Mr. Lyttleton, yet they were thrown out by a great majority. Another motion was made, that his majeſty be enabled to take into Britiſh pay ſuch a body of Hanoverian and Heſſian dragoons as ſhould be conſiſtent with the ſtate of affairs on the continent. This was moſt violently oppoſed by the country-party; and it was urged, that by the act of ſettlement, Great-Britain was not to be concerned in any war relating to his majeſty's electoral dominions; nay, ſome of the members inſiſted, that to demand money to ſupport the Hanoverian forces, was a groſs impoſition on the Engliſh nation; for they knew that thoſe troops could not take part with the queen of Hungary, without bringing his majeſty under the ban of the empire. It was anſwered by the minority, that every thing done by his majeſty was in compliance with the advice of his parliament; but this was denied by thoſe in the oppoſition, who inſiſted, that what was promiſed was upon a ſuppoſition that the ſtates-general would have joined their forces with thoſe of Great-Britain, in order to oppoſe the French, and ſupport the queen of Hungary in the peaceable poſſeſſion of her hereditary territories.

Much was ſaid by thoſe at the head of affairs concerning the balance of power in Europe, which could not be maintained conſiſtent with the ſafety of Britain, unleſs we aſſiſted the houſe of Auſtria. At laſt the queſtion being put, it was carried in favour of the miniſtry by a great majority. In the houſe of lords, it met with ſtill greater oppoſition; for earl Stanhope moved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying, that he would take into his royal conſideration the diſtreſs of the nation, in conſequence of the enormous load of taxes; and that he would be pleaſed to diſcharge all ſuch foreign troops as had been taken into Britiſh pay without the conſent of parliament. This motion was ſeconded by the earl of Sandwich, and ſupported by the duke of Bedford, the earl of Cheſterfield, viſcount Lonſdale, and lord Harvey. The principal ſpeakers in defence of the miniſtry were, the lord-chancellor Hardwick, the duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Cholmondeley and Bath, lord Bathurſt and lord Carteret; for ſentiments changed with the admiſſion into places.

The next buſineſs upon which the parliament entered, was to take into conſideration the ſtate of the licences for the ſale of wines and ſpirituous liquors, and to impoſe other duties upon them than what had been done hitherto. It appeared evident, that the late reſtriction upon the ſale of ſpirituous liquors had not been of any ſervice in promoting the health or morals of the people; and therefore, that the ſale of thoſe pernicious articles might become more common, it was propoſed to lower the taxes. The whole bench of biſhops voted againſt this meaſure; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in particular, ſpoke long and learnedly on the ſubject. Lord Harvey, who had been deprived of the privy-ſeal, vented all his ſpleen againſt the miniſtry, by comparing their conduct, in lowering the duties on ſpirituous liquors, to a tyrant who lets looſe a wild beaſt upon a parcel of innocent children. Many eloquent harangues were delivered in the houſe of lords on this memorable occaſion, particularly by the duke of Bedford, the earls of Cheſterfield, Sandwich, and Ayleſford, and the lords Talbot and Lonſdale.

On the other hand, the bill was ſupported by the duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Bath, Cholmondeley, and Ilay, with the lords Bathurſt and Carteret. During this argument, many brilliant ſallies of wit were thrown out on both ſides, particularly by the earl of Ilay, who levelled his ſatire at the biſhops; and by the earl of Cheſterfield, who ripped up all the ſores of the miniſtry. At laſt, the queſtion being put, it was, as uſual, carried in favour of the miniſtry, by a very great majority.

The minority in both houſes finding the power of the miniſtry too ſtrong for them to overthrow, reſolved to give them all the trouble they could, by plying them in parliament with one motion after another. Accordingly they moved, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would order the proper officer to lay before the houſe copies of all papers and memorials, with the anſwers to them, that had paſſed between the courts of Vienna and London: but this motion, with ſeveral others, was carried in favour of the miniſtry, while thoſe in the oppoſition were provoked to the higheſt degree.

On the twenty-third of April, his majeſty went to the houſe; and having given his aſſent to the bills, delivered a ſpeech, wherein he told them, that he had ordered his army, in conjunction with that of the queen of Hungary, to croſs the Rhine, and watch the motions of the French: that he had given orders to continue a ſtrong fleet in the Mediterranean, to prevent the Spaniards from ſending forces to Italy; and another in the Weſt-Indies: that he would not neglect any proper meaſures that could tend towards reſtoring the tranquillity of Europe, and procuring ſuch an honourable peace as would promote the intereſt both of his people and his allies. Laſtly, he thanked the commons for the chearful manner in which they had granted the ſupplies; told them, that the money ſhould be expended according to their direction; and doubted not but they would be ready to ſupport him on any future occaſion; and then the lord-chancellor prorogued both houſes.

During the beginning of this year, nothing was to be ſeen throughout the greateſt part of Europe, but preparations for opening the campaign. In Germany, the emperor Charles VII. was at the head of one party, ſtrongly ſupported by the French; and, in oppoſition to him, was the queen of Hungary, aſſiſted by Great-Britain. The Engliſh miniſtry endeavoured to prevail with the ſtates-general to join in ſupporting the houſe of Auſtria; and theſe endeavours being ſeconded by the prince of Orange, who was extremely fond of war, the Dutch raiſed, or rather increaſed, their army to forty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe, to be ready to march when ordered. This ſpirited reſolution in the ſtates, who had ſo long remained neuter, ſurpriſed all Europe; but, upon enquiry, it was found, that they had been inſtigated by Mr. Van Haren, a young gentleman, and one of the deputies. He wrote elegant allegorical pieces, wherein he compared Holland to ancient Greece, when that famous republic was oppreſſed by the Perſians and Macedonians; and theſe pieces being univerſally read, the people were rouſed from a ſtate of inſenſibility.

The king of Pruſſia was cultivating the arts of peace in his dominions. The new empreſs of Ruſſia refuſed to join the French; and the king of Sweden was too far advanced in years to engage in any enterprizes of a public nature. Such was the ſtate of Europe, when cardinal Fleury paid the debt of nature, in the ninetieth year of his age. He was a man of great political abilities, and ſeemed to poſſeſs the untainted ſimplicity of the primitive ages. He had lived in an obſcure manner till he was upwards of ſixty years old, and then he was appointed biſhop of Freijus, a ſmall living, and ſituated in a very unhealthy part of the kingdom. At laſt ſuperior merit brought him into office, and the pope honoured him with a cardinal's hat. As a miniſter, the principal object he had in view was to promote the internal happineſs of the French people, to preſerve peace in Europe, and to make his ſovereign great without oppreſſing his ſubjects. In him the French king loſt an able miniſter, a faithful ſervant, and an honeſt man: and although he might have enriched his family at the expence of the public, yet he deſpiſed ſuch meanneſs, and died extremely poor. Lewis XV. king of France, with his ſon, the late dauphin, viſited the cardinal in his laſt moments; and his dying advice to them was, to deſiſt from any farther connections in the war.

His Britannic majeſty, ever faithful in fulfilling ſuch conventions as he entered into with his allies, reſolved to viſit the continent; and therefore, ſoon after the prorogation of the parliament, he ſet out for Hanover, where he arrived on the ſixth of May, having firſt taken care of the internal peace of the nation, by appointing a regency to act, with plenary powers during his abſence.

The campaign had been opened this year ſooner than uſual. The queen of Hungary ſeemed to be in a proſperous ſtate; for the French army had ſuffered conſiderably during the preceding winter, owing to the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, and the ſoldiers crowding themſelves too near German ſtoves, filled with burning wood, the mortality among them became general, and vaſt numbers of them periſhed every day.

The emperor took the field with what forces he could raiſe, and ſeemed determined to act in the moſt vigorous manner; but prince Charles of Lorraine, having gathered together an army of Auſtrians, attacked the imperialiſts, and gave them a total overthrow. Beſides priſoners, five thouſand were left dead on the ſpot, and the whole baggage and artillery of the emperor fell into the hands of the Auſtrians. This victory opened a way for the Auſtrians to penetrate into Bavaria, and the towns in general ſurrendered on their approach. The diſcomfited emperor was obliged to take ſhelter in Augſburg, one of the imperial cities; but Mentzel, an Hungarian general, at the head of a ſtrong body of Pandours, drove him from it, ſo that he was obliged to ſeek ſhelter in Frankfort.

The Britiſh forces, under the command of the earl of Stair, began their march from the Lower Germany in the month of February, and on the nineteenth of May were joined by the Hanoverian, near the town of Aix-la-Chapelle. From thence the earl of Stair continued his march to the neighbourhood of Franckfort, where the emperor then was, and to whom he ſent a meſſenger to inform him, that his reaſon for marching into that part of Germany was to reſtore the peace of the empire, and that no diſturbance ſhould be given to him. The reſt of the allies marched at the ſame time to join the earl of Stair, the whole amounting to about thirty-ſeven thouſand men, encamped on the banks of the river Maine near Franckfort.

The French army, who expected that ſuch meaſures would be taken, reſolved to loſe no time, and therefore, on the fourteenth of May, the marſhal Noailles croſſed the Rhine and reduced the allied army to great hardſhips for proviſions. They even endeavoured to ſeize the town of Aſchaffenburgh, where there was a bridge over the Maine, but the vigilance of the earl of Stair prevented them from putting their intended project in execution. His Britannic majeſty, accompanied by the duke of Cumberland and lord Carteret, arrived in the camp of the allied army on the nineteenth of June, and was received amidſt the joyful acclamations of the ſoldiers. The ſame afternoon he reviewed the army, and found them in exceeding good order, after which he took up his reſidence in the palace of Aſchaffenburg.

But although the preſence of his Britannic majeſty raiſed the ſpirits of the ſoldiers, yet the allied army was ſtill in great diſtreſs; for the French had ſent out parties to ſeize all the boats on the Maine, and which was ſtill worſe, the allies were in danger of being ſurrounded in their camp and made priſoners of war. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, news was brought to the king of England, that prince Charles of Lorraine had made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of Bavaria, and that a body of Heſſians and Hanoverians were marching to join the allied army. This intelligence induced his Britannic majeſty to decamp in the night of the twenty-ſixth of June, in order to meet the auxiliary forces; for he was afraid, that had they continued their march much farther, they would have been ſurrounded and made priſoners by the French.

As ſoon as the French marſhal learned that the allied army had left their camp, he looked upon their deſtruction as inevitable, and therefore ordered thirty ſquadrons of dragoons to croſs the river and take poſt at the village of Dettingen, through which he knew they muſt paſs. At the ſame time the marſhal Noailles ordered four regiments of foot to march acroſs two temporary bridges, and conceal themſelves in a hollow way near the village of Dettingen, and the duke de Grammont, to whom the command of theſe forces was given, had orders not to attempt any thing, till ſuch time as the allies ſhould be hemmed in between the riſing grounds, that there would be no poſſibility of their eſcaping. All the paſſes on the Maine had been ſecured by the French marſhal, ſo that his Britannic majeſty found himſelf reduced to the alternative of either fighting on the moſt unequal terms, or to ſurrender a priſoner of war, with his whole army. But all the precautions taken by the French general were rendered abortive by the precipitate conduct of the duke de Grammont, who, impatient of waiting any longer, advanced to a riſing ground, and attacked the allies before the one half of them had paſſed the defile. Here the French were led into the ſame ſnare they had laid for their enemies; for their cannon, on the oppoſite ſide of the river, not being able to give the detached party any aſſiſtance, great numbers of the French were killed.

The marſhal de Noailles having ſeen from the oppoſite banks of the river, the conduct of the duke de Grammont, marched to his aſſiſtance, but too late; for the allied army behaved with ſo much intrepidity, that the French were defeated with great ſlaughter, and that army which in the morning ſeemed devoted to deſtruction, was in poſſeſſion of the field before evening. Indeed the conduct of his Britannic majeſty, during the whole of the engagement, was conſiſtent with the character of a great hero. He rode through the ranks, encouraging the men to exert themſelves to the utmoſt, and they obeyed in the moſt chearful manner. No troops ever behaved with greater bravery than the Engliſh, and ſome of their principal officers were killed, particularly general Clayton, who was ſhot dead by a random ſhot from a French cannon. General Monroy, a brave Hanoverian officer ſhared the ſame fate; and the gallant duke of Cumberland, whoſe behaviour during the battle procured him the eſteem of all preſent, was wounded in the leg, as were ſeveral other officers of the higheſt diſtinction.

It is certain, that whatever advantages were obtained on this occaſion, they fell to the ſhare of the Engliſh; but for all that, the French pretended they had obtained a complete victory. Few advantages, however, reſulted from it other than opening a paſſage for the Britiſh forces; and accordingly his majeſty continued his march to Hannau, where he was joined by the twelve thouſand Heſſians and Hanoverians, under the command of prince George of Heſſe-Caſſel.

The earl of Stair ſent a meſſenger to the marſhal de Noailles, recommending to his care ſuch of the wounded ſoldiers and officers as had been left on the field of battle; and to the honour of the French let it be mentioned, that they treated them with the utmoſt tenderneſs.

The French army, removing from their camp near Frankfort, marched to a town called Offenbach, on the ſouth ſide of the Maine, exactly oppoſite to Hannau, where his Britannic majeſty, with the allied army, then lay encamped, and both continued for ſome time looking at each other.

In Bavaria prince Charles of Lorraine defeated the marſhal de Broglio, and obliged him to retreat in the moſt precipitate manner. The emperor was reduced to ſuch poverty, that he actually wanted proviſions for his family, and muſt have diſcharged his domeſtics had not the marſhal de Noailles lent him forty thouſand crowns.

On the twelfth of July the marſhal de Noailles received information that prince Charles of Lorraine was marching, at the head of a powerful army, to attack him, upon which he ſet fire to his magazines, and in four days arrived with the French army at Worms, near the Rhine. In the mean time prince Charles arrived at Hannau, where he was received in the moſt friendly manner by his Britannic majeſty, and the plan of operations for the different armies, was agreed upon. The emperor, unable to ſupport his dignity, wearied out with the fatigues of war, and feeling for the miſery he had brought on his ſubjects, by being made a dupe to French councils, reſolved to conclude a ſeparate peace with the queen of Hungary; but the Auſtrian miniſter would hearken to no terms of accommodation. Many of the German princes began to conſider the queen of Hungary as too inflexible, and, at the ſame time, they pitied the unfortunate emperor, who longed earneſtly for peace. The two laſt places of importance in his dominions, viz. Egra and Ingolſtadt, were taken by the enemy, and in the laſt mentioned were found the records and archives of the electorate of Bavaria, the family jewels, pictures, plate, curioſities, and moſt of the valuable things belonging to the Bavarian nobility, nobility. This was a fatal ſtroke to the emperor; and, to increaſe his misfortune, his kinſman and faithful counſellor, the archbiſhop of Mentz, was dead, and his ſucceſſor was a friend to the Auſtrians. A proteſt was ſent from the Auſtrian miniſtry againſt the election of the emperor, declaring it null and void; and the elector of Mentz, as high-chancellor of the empire, ordered it to be regiſtered. This occaſioned many diſputes among the German princes, each party eſpouſing the cauſe that ſuited their intereſts or inclinations; but the moſt ſenſible complained of the conduct of the Auſtrians, in not hearkening to terms of accommodation.

Among thoſe who eſpouſed the cauſe of the emperor, was the king of Pruſſia, who declared, that he could not behold with indifference the head of the empire treated in ſo indignant a manner. That prince finding that nothing could perſuade the Auſtrian miniſtry to hearken to reaſon, went to Frankfort, where he had an interview with the emperor, which occaſioned much ſpeculation, eſpecially as the Pruſſian monarch was convinced that no confidence could be put in the French; and the emperor's connections were ſuch, that he could not, without great difficulty, diſengage himſelf from them.

Such was the ſituation of affairs, when his Britannic majeſty, at the head of the allied army, croſſed the Rhine near Mentz, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters in the city of Worms; while marſhal de Noailles retreated to Alſace, where he pitched his camp in the moſt ſafe and commodious manner. About the latter end of September, the allies marched from Worms to Spires, where they were joined by twenty thouſand Dutch auxiliaries, who had marched from Holland.

The army was now conſiderably increaſed; and having taken every neceſſary precaution, they entered into winter quarters about the latter end of October; but the huſſars and pandours, with other irregulars belonging to the Auſtrian army, penetrated into the dutchy of Lorrain, and ravaged it in the moſt cruel manner. Prince Charles of Lorrain, after an unſucceſsful attempt to croſs the Rhine, returned to the frontiers of Bavaria, where he diſtributed his troops into quarters of cantonment.

The earl of Stair, either diſpleaſed that his advice, in ſome things, had been rejected, or becauſe the king ſhewed more reſpect to the foreign generals, deſired leave to reſign his command, and the king returned to Hanover.

In Italy, the king of Sardinia raiſed an army of forty thouſand men, in order to oppoſe the Spaniards, who had taken poſſeſſion of Savoy: but he was too inactive; for he rather remained on the defenſive, than offered to attempt any thing of importance. Count de Gages, who commanded another army of Spaniards in Italy, tranſmitted accounts to Madrid, that he had loſt, out of forty thouſand men, above ten thouſand by ſickneſs: but the king of Spain, who was under the influence of his queen, ſent peremptory orders to the count to engage; and accordingly he croſſed the Panaro, and encamped in a place belonging to the pope, reſolving to act ſome time on the defenſive. He ſent ſeveral preſſing letters to the king of Naples, to ſend him a freſh reinforcement: but however willing that prince was to aſſiſt the Spaniards, yet he knew, that if he had ſent them any part of his army, the Engliſh fleet would have battered down his capital.

In the month of September, prince Lobkowitz was ſent to take the command of the Auſtrian army in Italy, and immediately reſolved to take the field. Accordingly he marched againſt count Gages, who not having force ſufficient to oppoſe him, retreated to Fano, a ſmall town near the gulph of Venice, where he reſolved to wait for the Auſtrians. He cauſed all the paſſes and avenues leading to the town to be fortified; but prince Lobkowitz, knowing that the place would naturally be given up on account of the ſcarcity of proviſions, and not doubting but, before the expiration of the ſeaſon, the Spaniſh army would be obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war, he did not offer to purſue them, but put his men into quarters.

The prince de Conti was ſent, at the head of twelve thouſand men, to reinforce the army in Savoy, under the command of Don Philip; and to theſe were added four thouſand foot, drawn from the Spaniſh regiments in Catalonia. The deſign of ſending theſe troops into Savoy, was to attempt to force a paſſage through the Alps, which had been attempted before by the marquis de las Minas, though without ſucceſs, and three thouſand of the Spaniſh ſoldiers were cut off. The united army of the French and Spaniards now amounted to fifty-ſix thouſand men. As it was difficult to procure proviſions for ſuch a numerous body of men in the mountains of Savoy, where the poor peaſants have ſcarce as much as will ſupport themſelves, it was reſolved, in a council of war, to march to Chateau-Dauphine; but, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, they found themſelves under the neceſſity of going into the ſame winter quarters they had occupied before: ſo that nothing of importance was done againſt his Sardinian majeſty during the whole of that campaign.

In the Mediterranean, things remained in the ſame ſituation as the preceding year. Admiral Matthews had taken care to prevent the Spaniſh and French fleets from joining; but as the French reſolved not to act any longer in an underhand manner, it was agreed, that the fleet blocked up in Toulon ſhould be reinforced by ſome ſhips juſt finiſhed in that harbour; while another ſquadron was to be fitted out at Breſt, to intercept any reinforcements that might happen to be ſent from England to the Mediterranean. But ſome ſhips belonging to the Spaniards being taken by Matthews, he found out the ſcheme laid to overpower him; and ſent notice of it to the miniſtry, earneſtly begging that they would ſend him more ſhips and men, the fleet being in a very miſerable ſituation.

Sir Chaloner Ogle ſucceeded to the united command of the army and navy, in the room of general Wentworth and admiral Vernon, who had both been recalled home; but the Spaniſh admiral, de Torres, was ſtill in the harbour of the Havannah, with a large fleet; ſo that it could not be expected that any thing of importance would be done.

Captain Knowles was ſent, with a ſmall ſquadron, to attack one of the Spaniſh ſettlements called Porto Cavallo; but the governor, either ſuſpecting, or having ſome intelligence of the attempt that was to be made, cauſed the fortifications to be repaired; and Knowles, not being able to reduce the place, was obliged to ſail for the iſland of Curacoa, belonging to the Dutch. A ſecond attempt was made on the ſame place; but although twelve hundred men were landed, under the command of major Lucas, yet ſcarce had they begun the attack, when they fell into confuſion, and were obliged to return to their ſhips.

On the continent of America, things were in no better a ſituation than in the Weſt-Indies: for although general Oglethorpe undertook a long, fatiguing march, to prevent the Spaniards from penetrating into any of our provinces, yet he was obliged to return to Georgia, without having been able to do any thing of importance.

Having thus deſcribed the ſtate of affairs abroad, we muſt now look back to England, where ſeveral things of importance happened that claim our immediate attention. In Scotland, a regiment of highlanders had been raiſed, under pretence that they were to act as militia in preſerving the peace of the country: but being ordered up to London, they were reviewed on Finchley-cymmon by general Wade, and then told that they muſt embark at Graveſend. This they complained of, as inconſiſtent with the terms upon which they had been embodied; and thererefore a large party mutinied, and ſet out, in order to return to their own country; but they were overtaken by a regiment of dragoons, and brought priſoners to the Tower, where three of them were ſhot, and the remainder ſent to the Weſt-Indies; while ſuch as had continued obedient embarked for Flanders, and behaved, in ſeveral engagements, with great bravery. The princeſs Louiſa of England being married, by proxy, to the prince-royal of Denmark, ſet out for that kingdom on the nineteenth of October, accompanied by the counteſs of Albemarle and baron Salenthall, a Daniſh nobleman. On the twenty-ninth, ſhe arrived at Hanover, and, on the eighteenth of November, was met at Altena by the prince, where they were publicly married, and then continued their journey to Copenhagen, the capital, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

His majeſty being returned from Hanover, the parliament met on the firſt of December; and the king, in his ſpeech, told them, that the ſituation of affairs on the continent had obliged him to head the army in perſon, where he had been joined by a large reinforcement from his good friends the Dutch: that, in order to reſtore peace to Europe, he had concluded a treaty with the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia, the particulars of which ſhould be laid before them. He added, that it would appear to them, that he had nothing ſo much at heart as the reſtoring the public tranquillity: and concluded by telling the commons, that although the expence was great, yet it was neceſſary; and therefore he doubted not but they would contribute, in the moſt chearful manner, to ſupport the dignity of the crown, and promote the happineſs of the people.

Great debates aroſe in the houſe of lords concerning the nature of the addreſs that ſhould be preſented to his majeſty: for the earl of Sandwich moved, that the Hanoverians ſhould no longer be continued in the pay of Great-Britain, becauſe they were of no real ſervice to the nation.

The motion, however, was over-ruled by a great majority, and twenty-five peers proteſted againſt it. It was much the ſame in the houſe of commons: for although ſeveral members moved for the diſcontinuation of Hanoverians in the Britiſh ſervice, yet the miniſtry carried all before them. That ſyſtem of bribery that had been firſt planned by Sir Robert Walpole, and brought to a ſtate of perfection during twenty years that he was at the head of public affairs, had made the majority of both houſes a ſtanding council to the crown; and thus the public money was ſpent in debauching the morals of the people.

This year John duke of Argyle died, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age. He was one of the moſt ſteady patriots that ever adorned any nation whatever. No ſcheme propoſed by the miniſter was ever embraced or ſupported by him, if it appeared to be inconſiſtent with the rights of the people. He had ſerved the crown in ſome of the higheſt departments of the ſtate; but neither promiſes nor threatenings could ever make him ſwerve from that duty he owed to his country. He lived an honeſt man, and died lamented by every lover of virtue.

A. D. 1744. The firſt thing that the parliament took into conſideration, was the raiſing the proper ſupplies for carrying on the war; and ſo great was the power of the miniſtry, that ten millions were granted, a ſum that increaſed the national debt to an enormous height, and burthened the people with taxes almoſt intolerable to be borne. Many worthy members of both houſes oppoſed ſuch ſcandalous meaſures, by which ruin was threatened to the whole nation. But their attention was led off by an event that called upon both parties to unite in the ſame common cauſe.

Charles Stuart, the eldeſt ſon of the pretender, had left Rome; and travelling through Italy in the moſt private manner, arrived in France, where he had a conference with the French king, who had invited him to Paris, in hopes of ſending him over to Britain; not doubting but the diſcontents in that kingdom would enable him to procure a powerful party, and by theſe means lead the Britiſh forces out of Flanders. Accordingly, a body of troops was raiſed in France to aſſiſt him, and count Saxe was appointed the commander in chief.

Count Saxe had been ſome time in England, and had taken notice that there were but few places fortified in a regular manner; and therefore, upon his return, having made a proper repreſentation of theſe things, an army of fifteen thouſand men was ordered to march to the coaſt near Calais, Dunkirk, and Boulogne, where the young pretender was to ſee them embarked on board the proper tranſports. It is neceſſary to take notice, that although hoſtilities had, in ſome meaſure, been commenced between us and the French, yet war had not been declared; and therefore our miniſtry ſent an expreſs to Mr. Thompſon, then at Paris, to remonſtrate to the French miniſtry on their conduct; but he only received evaſive anſwers. A fleet of men of war had been fitted out at Breſt, as a convoy to the tranſports; and the command being given to M. Roquefeuille, that admiral ſailed up the Britiſh channel, but was diſcovered by ſome Engliſh cruiſers, who took ſhelter in the harbour of Plymouth, and ſent an expreſs to the board of admiralty. Sir John Norris was ſent to take upon him the command of the fleet; and being joined by ſome other ſhips of the line, he found himſelf ſuperior to the enemy.

The deſign of the French was to have landed their forces in Kent, and thereby ſtrike ſuch a terror into the people in London, that they would be obliged to abandon their houſes; but the Engliſh miniſtry took every precaution to fruſtrate their deſigns. Several regiments were ordered to march towards the coaſt oppoſite France; proper care was taken of the forts, and the governors and commanders of garriſons were ordered to repair to their reſpective ſtations. The militia were raiſed; the laws in force againſt the papiſts and non-jurors were ordered to be put in execution; and the earl of Stair was again appointed commander in chief of the army.

In the mean time, the French went on with their preparations for the embarkation of their forces; and ſeven thouſand went on board at Dunkirk, while M. Roquefeuille attempted to get up the channel; but ſtopping near the Iſle of Wight, he was informed that the Engliſh ſquadron had deſerted their ſtation. He ſent Mr. De Barreil, his ſecond in command, with two ſhips of the line, to haſten the embarkation at Dunkirk; while he ſet ſail with the reſt of the fleet, and came to an anchor at a place called Dungenneſs, eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Dover.

Sir John Norris, who had received information concerning the French fleet, ſet ſail from the Downs, and would have come up with them, had not the wind ſhifted about, ſo that he was obliged to caſt anchor within two leagues of the enemy. This induced the French admiral to call a council of war, and the reſult of it was, that they were to ſail home to their own coaſt, becauſe they had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the Engliſh. Accordingly they weighed anchor; and a hard gale ſpringing up, they arrived off Cape Barfleur in a very ſhattered condition. The tranſports in particular were ſo much diſtreſſed for want of neceſſary proviſions, that many of the men were ſo extremely ſick, that they were obliged to be landed; and this mighty armament, which had made ſo much noiſe, ended in nothing. The Engliſh remained maſters of the ſeas; and Sir John Norris returned with his ſquadron to the Downs, from whence he detached ſeveral ſhips to annoy the enemy. The pretender, who, a few weeks before, ſuppoſed that he would be able to make himſelf maſter of England by conqueſt, was obliged to return to Rome; for the court of France, whoſe tool he was, looked upon him in a very cold and indifferent manner.

The ſuſpicion of danger, in conſequence of a foreign invaſion, induced the parliament to ſet aſide the habeas corpus act; and, in conſequence thereof, ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were taken into cuſtody;

but no proof of their guilt appearing, the court of King's-bench admitted them to bail, and they were ſoon after diſcharged. On the eighteenth of March, ſix thouſand Dutch forces arrived at Graveſend, in conſequence of a former treaty; and the French king finding all his ſchemes rendered abortive, declared war againſt Great-Britain on the twentieth day of March. On the thirty-firſt day of the ſame month, his Britannic majeſty publiſhed a counter-declaration of war, to the great joy of the nation; for the people in general had long beheld, with indignation, the inſults daily offered to the Britiſh flag; while the moſt ſolemn treaties had been diſregarded, and public faith, the baſis of peace, trampled on.

War was, at the ſame time, declared againſt the queen of Hungary, by the French; ſo that nothing was to be ſeen but preparations for taking the field as early as poſſible. On the third of April, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, in a moſt pathetic ſpeech, informed them, that, with reſpect to the event of the war, and the ſupport of his faithful and loyal ſubjects, he depended on the divine providence. He told them, that he had not drawn the ſword till forced to it; and that, as he had but one intereſt with his people, ſo he depended upon them for ſupport. Affectionate and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes to his majeſty; and a bill was brought in, to make it high-treaſon in any Britiſh ſubject to correſpond with the pretender. This bill having paſſed in the houſe of commons, was carried to the upper houſe, where the lord-chancellor Hardwicke moved, that an amendment ſhould be made, by extending the act to the natural lives of the pretender's two ſons. Debates aroſe upon the merits of the amendment; for it was argued, that however imprudent it might be in Britiſh ſubjects to correſpond with ſuch as had the moſt diſtant claim to the crown, yet it was inconſiſtent with humanity to make it criminal, particularly high-treaſon, the greateſt offence that can be committed in the eye of the law. It paſſed, however, by a ſmall majority, though not till eighteen lords had entered a proteſt againſt it: and when it was ſent down to the commons, great oppoſition was made to the amendment by thoſe who had framed the bill; but the court party carried it, and ſoon after it received the royal aſſent. The parliament was prorogued on the fifteenth of May, when his majeſty told them, that the vaſt preparations then making by the French was a proof of their ambitious views, and therefore the ſafety of the nation depended on oppoſing them in the moſt vigorous manner: and he thanked the commons for their generoſity in furniſhing the ſupplies.

The fleet under the command of admiral Matthews had been ſtrongly reinforced; for he had no leſs than forty veſſels, twenty-eight of which were of the line. On board were fifteen thouſand ſeamen, with eight hundred men drawn from the garriſons in Minorca. The French and Spaniſh fleets had been, for a conſiderable time, blocked up in the harbour of Toulon; but the queen of Spain, who could ſet no bounds to her ambition, ſtirred up the French to give abſolute orders for their admirals to engage. Accordingly an expreſs was diſpatched to Toulon; and on the ninth of February this year, the combined fleet came out of the harbour; and admiral Matthews, who had watched all their motions, made the neceſſary preparations to attack them. Leſtock commanded the left wing, or rear; Rowley the right, or van; and Matthews the center. But the wind dying away, they were obliged to come to an anchor. Next day, towards the evening, both fleets came very near to each other; but neither the French or Spaniſh admirals ſeemed willing to engage, becauſe of the ſuperior force of the Engliſh. However, the admiral reſolved to loſe no time, and therefore gave orders for a general attack; but Leſtock kept back his ſhips, and ſuffered four of the Spaniſh ones to paſs him. The captains Hawke, Cornwall, Oſborne, and Forbes, behaved with the moſt unparalleled bravery; but ſome of the other captains acted in ſuch a manner, as to be a diſhonour to their country. Captain Cornwall commanded the Marlborough; and, after reducing the Real, the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, to a perfect wreck, had both his legs ſhot off, and at laſt was killed by one of the enemy's chain-ſhot. The command having devolved upon the firſt lieutenant, the ſhip continued to fight till near five in the evening, when ſhe was towed out of the fleet, as unfit for action. The Royal Philip, another Spaniſh ſhip, was ſo much diſabled, that admiral Matthews ordered one of the fire-ſhips to burn her. Theſe fire-ſhips are filled with gun-powder, and other combuſtibles, with grappling-irons on the fronts and ſides, which fix them to the enemy's ſhips; and then the ſailors getting into boats, ſet fire to them, when all blow up together. It is the conſtant practice to ſend one of the large ſhips to protect the fire-ſhip from being blown up by the enemy; and Matthews took that precaution, but the captain did not obey his orders. In the mean time, the brave captain Mackay, who commanded the fire-ſhip, though unſupported by any veſſel whatever, continued to advance; and Leſtock having ſuffered the Spaniards to advance, Mackay ſaw his deſtruction inevitable, and therefore reſolved to loſe his life in the deſtruction of the Royal Philip. In conſequence of that deſperate reſolution, he got up along-ſide of the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, and lighting a match, ſet fire to the combuſtibles, and was blown up, without doing any other damage to the enemy than covering their decks with the wreck. The Namur, in which admiral Matthews was, ſuffered much in this engagement; and had ſhe not been aſſiſted by the brave captain Hawke, in the Berwick, ſhe muſt have been deſtroyed. Hawke took one of the Spaniſh ſhips of the line; but ſhe was the next day retaken by the French, who finding that ſhe was not fit for ſervice, burnt her. Towards the evening, the French admiral, M. de Court, attacked that part of the fleet under the command of Rowley; and although Leſtock was witneſs to this, yet he did not ſo much as offer him the leaſt aſſiſtance. Night coming on, the firing ceaſed; but next morning, Matthews ſeeing the enemy to the leeward, continued in purſuit of them till dark. In the morning, the enemy's ſhips were diſcovered from the top-maſt-head, and Leſtock was ſent in purſuit of them; but before he could come up with them, Matthews gave the ſignal for him to deſiſt, and ſteered for the iſland of Minorca. The Spaniſh fleet, under the command of Don Navarro, got into the harbour of Carthagena, and that of the French into Alicant.

As ſoon as Matthews arrived in Minorca, he deprived Leſtock of his command, and ſent him a priſoner to England. The public were much divided in their opinions concerning the conduct of the two commanders; but certain it is, they were men that, from motives of private reſentment, ſacrificed the public intereſt; ſo that, notwithſtanding the vaſt expence the nation had been at in fitting out the fleet, and after many brave men had been killed, no advantages were reaped from an engagement which, if rightly conducted, would have been the deſtruction of the Spaniſh and French navies. Matthews having reſigned his command of the fleet to admiral Rowley; and coming to England, was put under an arreſt by order of the government. A committee of the houſe of commons was appointed to enquire into his conduct, and that of admiral Leſtock; but they not being properly acquainted with the import of ſea-terms, nor the form of naval engagements, preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, praying that he would iſſue his warrant to a court-martial to try the delinquents. As is cuſtomary in ſuch caſes, many of the evidences were abroad; ſo that the court-martial did not deliver their judgment till the latter end of the year 1746, when Leſtock was, to the ſurprize of every one, acquitted, and Matthews declared incapable of ever ſerving his majeſty, and all his commiſſions were taken from him. People in general blaimed the court martial, nor is it fully known to this day, which of the commanders were moſt deſerving of cenſure. Both were men of courage and abilities, but ſome private reſentment operated ſo ſtrongly upon their minds, that no good could be expected from any thing undertaken by them in concert.

The mediterranean being thus in a manner left open, the Spaniards had an opportunity of ſending forces and proviſions to Italy, while Don Philip was ſupplied in the ſame manner by the French. The Sardinian army, which had hitherto only guarded the paſſes of the Alps, had ſent a ſtrong detachment to Nice, and that place being conſidered as of the utmoſt importance, Don Philip and the French general reſolved to attack it. This was one of the boldeſt reſolutions that could have been formed, becauſe in that mountainous country a ſingle battalion can ſtop a whole army; and what was ſtill more, the king of Sardinia had formed a ſtrong camp near Villa Franca, which ſeemed almoſt impregnable.

About the latter end of March Don Philip and the prince of Conti, having collected their forces together, croſſed the Var, a river that runs from the Alps, and having taken the city of Nice, they advanced to attack the camp of the king of Sardinia in the midſt of rocks and mountains almoſt inacceſſible. A detachment from the forces on board the Engliſh fleet were ſent to aſſiſt the king of Sardinia; but the French and Spaniards, animated by the example of the two young princes who commanded them, made themſelves maſters of the firſt lines that ſerved as an advanced guard to the batteries of Villa Franca. Every thing gave way to the ardour of the French and Spaniſh troops, and although they loſt above ſix thouſand men, yet they proceeded from one rock to another, and made priſoner the marquis de Suze, natural brother to the king of Sardinia, and above three thouſand men under his command. Another moſt furious attack was made on Montalban, a ſtrong fort belonging to the king of Sardinia, and taken after an obſtinate reſiſtance; while the remainder of the Piedmonteſe army embarked on board the Engliſh fleet, and were landed at a town called Oneglia, ſeven miles ſouth-weſt of Genoa.

A paſſage being thus opened into Italy, the Spaniards advanced to Oneglia, from whence the Piedmonteſe troops, under the command of general Sinzan, retreated and encamped at a place called Gareſſio, ſituated among rocks almoſt inacceſſible. But notwithſtanding all the advantages obtained by the French and Spaniards, yet they were in great want of proviſions in a country not capable of cultivation; and the artillery was obliged to be drawn by the ſoldiers. This induced the prince of Conti to propoſe to Don Philip, that, in order to preſerve the army, they muſt endeavour to return to the borders of France; and accordingly, on the ninth of June, all the detached parties being called in, they croſſed the Var, and ſoon after reached the Upper Dauphine, where they ſeparated in order to prepare for entering Italy by Demont, and ſome other paſſes that were then guarded by his Sardinian majeſty, who had taken every proper precaution, and although not an active general, yet diſplayed a large ſhare of military ſkill in oppoſing the enemy.

On the eighteenth of July, early in the morning, the French and Spaniſh armies, having ſtruck their tents, began to put in practice their intended ſcheme of forcing a paſſage into Italy, in a more advantageous manner than what had been attempted before. The undertaking was one of the moſt hazardous that could have been imagined, the Sardinian troops had every advantage on their ſide; but the French and Spaniards ſurmounted all difficulties, and took the paſs of Monte Cavallo, although defended by a detachment of twelve hundred men. The French grenadiers leaped into the intrenchments, and by the favour of a fog, which prevented the enemy from diſcovering them, took one redoubt after another, though not without the loſs of near four thouſand men. The king of Sardinia, driven from his ſtrong holds, reſolved to collect all his forces together, and provide for the ſafety of his capital city of Turin. The French and Spaniſh armies, fluſhed with ſucceſs, continued their march through defiles almoſt inacceſſible, and the whole plain country of Piedmont being now laid open to them, they exacted heavy contributions from the people, and enforced the payment of them under the ſevereſt penalties.

Don Philip and the prince of Conti reſolved to attack Coni, a ſtrong fort about ten leagues ſouth of Turin, and garriſoned by twelve hundred men, under the command of baron Leutrum, who had taken every neceſſary meaſure to put it in a proper ſtate of defence, ſo as to preſerve it to the laſt extremity. The king of Sardinia having been joined by the forces under general Pallavicini, found himſelf at the head of thirty-ſix thouſand men, and conſcious that if Coni fell into the hands of the enemy, they would ſoon be maſters of Turin, his capital city, reſolved to put the whole upon the hazard of a battle, a ſtep much more conſiſtent with ſound policy, than to remain inactive. Accordingly, he marched to attack them in the intrenchments they had thrown up before the walls of Coni, but found it impracticable to bring them to a general engagement. The ſeaſon of the year, however, ſeconded his operations; for the French and Spaniſh armies had ſuffered ſo much, that they were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and march back to Dauphine, leaving their ſick and wounded behind them to the mercy of the Piedmonteſe, and the whole country in poſſeſſion of his Sardinian majeſty.

In the more interior parts of Italy, the prince Lobkowitz carried on the war againſt the Spaniſh forces; and the king of Naples, having pulled off the maſk, declared that he would aſſiſt his father the king of Spain; becauſe, as he alledged, he had been treated in a very illegal manner by the courts of London and Vienna. He inſinuated farther, that the queen of Hungary had attempted to raiſe an inſurrection in his dominions, and that prince Lobkowitz was to aſſiſt in driving him out of his hereditary dominions. The army under count Gages had marched towards the Neapolitan territories, while the Auſtrians marched towards Rome; and it was reſolved by the king of Naples, that both ſhould come to a general engagement; and accordingly they came in ſight of each other in the neighbourhood of Velletri, about twenty-ſeven miles eaſt of Rome, where they threw up entrenchments. For ſome time they remained inactive; but prince Lobkowitz, having received intelligence that one wing of the Spaniſh army was quite uncovered, reſolved to ſurprize it and ſeize on their head quarters in the town of Velletri, where their ammunition was kept.

This project was executed in ſuch a manner as muſt for ever reflect honour upon the prince; for about midnight count Brown, having been ſent at the head of ſix thouſand Auſtrians, forced the advanced guards, and, entering the town, put all thoſe whoſe oppoſed him to the ſword, while ſuch as ſubmitted were made priſoners of war. The king of Naples and the duke of Modena, narrowly eſcaped being taken; but count Brown being afraid that his retreat would be cut off, marched out of the town, ſo that no beneficial conſequences flowed from an enterprize ſo hazardous in its own nature, and ſo well conducted. As moſt of the Auſtrian ſoldiers had been taken from cold countries, ſo the climate of Italy did not agree with their conſtitution. The heat at autumn deſtroyed them in great numbers, and prince Lobkowitz, who imagined himſelf on the eve of victory, found his army daily decreaſing. Count de Gages, who from the whole of his conduct, ſeems to have been a very experienced general, reſolved to avail himſelf of the diſtreſſed condition of the Auſtrian army; and therefore, as ſoon as he heard that they had marched from Velletri, he reſolved to haraſs them as much as poſſible. Accordingly he ſtruck his tents; and coming up with the Auſtrians under the walls of Rome, where part of them had croſſed the Tiber, and broke down the bridges, a ſmart engagement enſued, in which the Auſtrians were the greateſt ſufferers: at the ſame time, great numbers of their ſoldiers deſerted, ſo that the prince's army was reduced to a handful of men; but notwithſtanding, he made good his retreat, amidſt a thouſand difficulties. At Gabbio, in the territory of Bologna, he received information that the French and Spaniſh troops had been driven out of Italy, which gave freſh ſpirits to the forces under his command; and he put them into winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Imola, about one hundred and eighty miles north-weſt of Rome; while the count de Gages, unable to purſue him any farther, retired to Viterbo, on the eaſt of Rome, and the winter was ſpent in making preparations for another campaign. Such was the ſtate of affairs, with reſpect to military operations, in Italy, during this year; and therefore we muſt now turn our thoughts to another part of Europe.

In Germany, the emperor ſaw himſelf ſtripped of every thing, and reduced to the neceſſity of living on a penſion from France; but even that diſtreſs became of ſervice to him. Other princes beheld with indignation the inflexible ſpirit of the houſe of Auſtria, that would not hearken to any terms; and therefore the kings of Sweden and Pruſſia, with the elector Palatine, entered into a confederacy with France, in order to ſupport the emperor, and trouble the queen of Hungary. A declaration of their intentions was publiſhed, with this view, that the people of England, ſeeing ſuch a confederacy formed againſt the queen of Hungary, might be induced to withdraw from her any farther aſſiſtance. The king of Pruſſia ſent an order to his ambaſſador at London to remonſtrate to our court on the impropriety of diſtreſſing the head of the empire, and granting too much power to the houſe of Auſtria. This memorial was publiſhed in all our news-papers, and it convinced our miniſtry that the king of Pruſſia was well acquainted with the ſtate of parties in England.

The king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, reſolved to avail himſelf of the convention that had been formed againſt the houſe of Auſtria; and therefore he entered into an agreement with the queen of Hungary, to furniſh her with thirty thouſand men. In return, the queen was to give him a part of Sileſia, to which he laid claim by an ancient title; for all the German princes have claims, or at leaſt pretend to have, to each other's territories. But money was another motive with the king of Poland: he expected a ſubſidy from Britain; for moſt of the German princes are ſo poor, and live in ſuch an extravagant manner, that they let out their troops to ſuch as bid moſt for them.

The French king, determined to proſecute the war to the utmoſt, aſſembled an army of one hundred and twenty thouſand men in the Netherlands, under the command of marſhal de Noailles and count Saxe. Lewis XV. having heard that his army was aſſembled, ſet out from Paris, in order to be preſent during the campaign; for, from a variety of concurring circumſtances, he doubted not of being ſucceſsful.

On the fourth of May, the French king reviewed his army at Liſle; and made ſeveral regulations relating to military diſcipline, which, for ſome time, had been too much neglected. The confederate army, compoſed of Britiſh, Dutch, Hanoverians, Heſſians, and Auſtrians, amounting to about ſeventy-ſix thouſand, encamped in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels, under the command of three different generals. Marſhal Wade commanded the Engliſh and Hanoverians; the duke of Aremberg had the command of the Hungarians; and the Dutch under count Maurice of Naſſau. Theſe three generals were greatly eſteemed by their reſpective ſovereigns. Wade had been brought up under the great duke of Marlborough; Aremberg had ſerved in many campaigns with prince Eugene; and count Maurice was deſcended from thoſe heroes who had eſtabliſhed the liberty of the united provinces. The only thing that tended towards retarding the progreſs of the allies, was the conduct of the Dutch: for although they had taken the field, yet they were very unwilling to engage; and therefore ſent count de Waſſenaer to Lewis, to expoſtulate with him on the terrors they were under, becauſe of his army being ſo near the frontiers of their provinces. But the French king told the Dutch miniſter, that he had long borne with the inſults of his enemies; but as his indulgence had only emboldened them in their deſigns againſt him, he was determined not to hearken to any terms, but to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour.

The city of Courtray ſurrendered at the approach of the French; and Menin, one of the Dutch frontier towns, in which was a garriſon of fifteen hundred men, was taken, after a ſiege of four days, and both ſoldiers and officers made priſoners of war. Thirty thouſand French, under the command of count Clermont, attacked Ypres, in which was a garriſon of two thouſand five hundred men, commanded by the prince of Heſſe Philipſthal. The ſiege of this city began on the firſt of June, and continued till the fourteenth, when moſt of the outworks being taken, the governor was forced to capitulate. This important event opened a way for the French to penetrate into the center of the Auſtrian Netherlands, where the garriſons ſurrendered almoſt as ſoon as attacked.

The allies could not ſtop the progreſs of the French; and their generals beheld their towns taken, one after another, without being able to give them any aſſiſtance. The French king made his public entry into Dunkirk in the moſt pompous manner, imagining that every thing would give way to his arms; but news was brought him, that prince Charles of Lorrain had croſſed the Rhine in ſight of the French army, at the head of ſeventy thouſand men; and had entered Alſace, after taking poſſeſſion of the important paſs of Lauterburg.

The conduct of prince Charles in croſſing the Rhine did him great honour, and aſtoniſhed all Europe, for it was looked upon as next to impoſſible; but the activity of the prince, and the perſeverance of his troops, ſurmounted every difficulty. Marſhal Coigni, who commanded the French army on the Rhine, ſaw with aſtoniſhment the Auſtrians in poſſeſſion of Alſace, and the whole province of Lorrain laid open to prince Charles. He ſaw no other means left but that of cutting his way through the enemy, which he attempted, and a bloody battle enſued; but the French were defeated, and obliged to return to their former ſtation; while flying parties infeſted the neighbourhood of Lorrain; and king Staniſlaus, with his whole court, was obliged to retire from his capital city of Nancy. When news of this was brought to the French king, he did not heſitate one moment concerning the proper ſteps to be taken; but leaving an army of forty thouſand men, under the command of marſhal Saxe, to protect his new conqueſts in Flanders, he ſet out to join his army on the Rhine, accompanied by the marſhal de Noailles, at the head of above fifty thouſand men. Upon his arrival at Metz, in Lorrain, he received information that an event of the utmoſt importance had taken place, and drawn the attention of prince Charles to another part. The king of Pruſſia marched through Saxony into Bohemia, at the head of eighty-four thouſand men, and a large train of artillery. On the frontiers of Bohemia, he was joined by twenty thouſand men from Sileſia; and on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, he eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Peterſwald, where he publiſhed a manifeſto, in order to juſtify his conduct in having taken up arms againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

Having cauſed ſeveral copies of this memorial to be diſperſed, he continued his march to Prague, which he inveſted: and having taken one fortification after another, the commander, general Ogilvy, ſurrendered, and fifteen thouſand men were made priſoners of war. Having placed a garriſon of ſix thouſand men in Prague, he left that city, and reduced ſeveral other places in Bohemia. But conqueſts are more eaſily obtained than preſerved.

News of the ſtate of affairs in Bohemia having been tranſmitted to Vienna, orders were ſent to prince Charles to repaſs the Rhine, which he did a ſecond time in ſight of the French army, although they were much ſuperior to him in number. The king of France had been ſeized with a violent fever at Metz, and his life was, for ſome time, deſpaired of; but by proper care, and a good conſtitution, he recovered, to the great joy of his ſubjects, whoſe fears were conſiſtent with that reſpect always ſhewn by the French to their ſovereigns.

The king of Pruſſia no ſooner heard that prince Charles had croſſed the Rhine, than he complained bitterly of the French generals for not oppoſing him, but he only received evaſive anſwers. In the mean time, prince Charles having been reinforced by twenty thouſand Saxons, and a conſiderable number of Auſtrians under the command of general Bathiani, reſolved to attack the Pruſſian monarch, well knowing that he was too far diſtant from his own territories to procure new reinforcements. Indeed, the king was ſenſible that it was not in his power to ſtand his ground in Bohemia; and therefore, having abandoned all the paſſes leading to Prague, he entered that city, to which he was cloſely purſued by the Auſtrians. On the nineteenth of November, he marched from Prague, leaving behind him his whole train of artillery; and ſo much did the Auſtrians haraſs his fatigued troops, and ſuch was the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, that many died: and when he arrived in Sileſia, the greateſt part of the army were naked. Having diſtributed them into winter quarters, he returned to Berlin, mortified with his diſappointment, and filled with indignation againſt the French ſtate.

The affairs of Germany now began to aſſume a new form. Count Seckendorff had driven the Auſtrians out of Bavaria; and, on the twenty-ſecond day of October, the emperor entered his capital city of Munich. The French marſhals, Belleiſle, Noailles, and Coigni, were at the head of eighty thouſand men; and on the firſt of September, they inveſted the city of Friburg, a place of great ſtrength, and ſtill greater importance, as it opened a paſſage into the circle of Suabia. The French king, being perfectly reſtored to health, took into his ſervice the famous count Lowendahl, and ſet out for his army at Friburg, where he arrived on the eleventh of October, amidſt the acclamations of the ſoldiers, who rejoiced to ſee their ſovereign once more reſtored to them. The trenches were immediately opened, and the garriſon made a vigorous defence; but the ſuperior power and knowledge of the French overcame every obſtacle; and the place was ſurrendered on the twenty-eight day of November, all the ſoldiers having been made priſoners of war.

This was a moſt valuable acquiſition to the French, though it was dearly purchaſed, for they loſt upwards of eighteen thouſand men. In the arſenal they found three hundred pieces of cannon, ſeventy-two field-pieces, and two hundred mortars, with a ſuitable proportion of all other ſorts of artillery and ammunition.

Thus ended the campaign in Germany; and the French troops were put into quarters of cantonment along the banks of the Rhine, while their king returned to Paris, where he was received with ſuch demonſtrations of joy as had more the appearance of adoration paid to a divine being, than the homage due to an earthly ſovereign.

In Flanders, the allies finding that the greateſt part of the French army had been obliged to march to the Higher Germany, reſolved to take the advantage of their abſence: and accordingly, having croſſed the Scheld, a river that runs through great part of the Netherlands, attempted to force marſhal Saxe to come to an engagement; but that general, ever cautious where he ſaw the leaſt appearance of danger, kept himſelf behind his trenches, waiting for a more favourable opportunity.

The allied army finding they could not bring marſhal Saxe to an engagement, filed off towards Liſle, the capital of French Flanders, which they might have taken, but they neglected ſo valuable an opportunity, for which the conduct of the generals was ſeverely cenſured in England. The truth is, the generals were divided in their opinions: Wade was too indolent to conduct any enterprize that required courage: the duke de Aremberg was afraid of giving umbrage to the French king, becauſe great part of his eſtate lay in France: and the Dutch generals were as inactive as if they had not had any connection in the war.

The naval power of England in the Mediterranean had not performed any thing, during this year, of real ſervice to the nation; and therefore it is neceſſary that we ſhould turn our thoughts to commodore Anſon, whom we have already mentioned as being ſent on an expedition into the South-ſeas. In the month of January 1741, the commodore arrived in the bay of St. Indian, on the coaſt of Patagonia, where he called a council of war, in order to conſult on the moſt proper methods to be uſed in diſtreſſing the enemy in that quarter of the world.

From St. Indian he ſailed to the ſtreights of La Maire, where he loſt ſight of the Severn and the Pearl, two of his ſhips; nor did he ever ſee them again during the remainder of his voyage; for they were ſo much ſhattered, that they were obliged to return to the Brazils to refit, and from thence they ſailed for Europe. This induced the commodore to ſail to the iſland of Juan Fernandez, where ſuch of the men as had been long afflicted with the ſcurvy, recovered in a moſt ſurpriſing manner, that ſmall place being eſteemed one of the moſt healthy in the univerſe. The Wager, a ſhip of twenty guns, belonging to Anſon's ſquadron, having been driven on the iſland of Socoro, the crew mutinied, and confined the captain; after which they converted the long-boat into a ſchooner, in which they ſet ſail for the Brazils, where they arrived in the month of January 1742. The captain, with ſuch of the men as had continued firm in his intereſt, had the good fortune to get on board a veſſel that carried them to Chiloi, and from thence to St. Jago, the capital of Chili, where they remained till there was a cartel for the exchange of priſoners, when they were ſent home to England.

Commodore Anſon was now reduced to a moſt ſhocking condition, in a part of the world where he could not procure any aſſiſtance; and his ſmall fleet conſiſted of no more than three ſhips, namely, the Centurion, the Glouceſter, and the Anna, which laſt was loaded with proviſions. But that fortitude and preſence of mind that ſeemed to be the particular characteriſtic of Mr. Anſon, never forſook him, even in the midſt of the greateſt dangers. He reſolved to attack the city of Paita, where the Spaniards had a large ſum of money, which they intended to ſend to Europe; and accordingly he ordered his lieutenant, Mr. Brett, to land in the night, with only fifty-eight men; all which was accompliſhed without their being perceived by the enemy. Such was the conſternation among the inhabitants, who imagined that a great army was landed among them, that, with the governor, they abandoned the place in the utmoſt confuſion; while the Engliſh ſailors ſeized on all the treaſure, which they conveyed to their ſhips; and then the commodore ſent ſome more of his hands on ſhore, who ſet fire to the town, and reduced it to an heap of aſhes.

This was a moſt fatal ſtroke to the Spaniards, whoſe loſs amounted to above fifteen hundred thou-

The MANILLA GALEON taken by ADMIRAL ANSON ſand dollars: and the commodore having weighed anchor, ſet ſail for the coaſts of Mexico and California. His deſign was to intercept the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at ſea, and deſtined for the harbour of Acapulco; but it was the nineteenth of February before Mr. Anſon could get into the bay of Mexico. When he arrived there, he had the mortification to learn, that the Manilla ſhip had got into the harbour of Acapulco on the ninth day of January, and that ſhe was to have failed ſoon after; but no ſooner had the Spaniſh governor learned that an Engliſh ſquadron was in thoſe ſeas, than he gave orders to countermand the ſailing of the ſhip; ſo that the commodore ſaw no other method left to ſave his ſhips, than to croſs the vaſt Pacific ocean, for the river of Canton in China. The Centurion and Glouceſter were all the ſhips he had now left; for although he had taken ſeveral prizes, yet not having hands to navigate them in a proper manner, they were obliged to be ſunk; while the Glouceſter, ſoon after, having ſprung a leak, was obliged to be ſet on fire; ſo that there remained none but the Centurion.

The hardſhips which the crew of the Centurion ſuffered are almoſt beyond conception; for ſo many of the men were afflicted with the ſcurvy, that there was ſcarce a ſufficient number left to do the neceſſary duty. At laſt they made for the iſland of Tinian, in the vaſt Pacific ocean, where moſt of the crew recovered, but the whole number amounted to no more than ſeventy-one. Having taken in all ſorts of neceſſary proviſions, he once more put to ſea, and arrived in the river of Canton in China on the twelfth day of November, after having ſuffered every thing that human nature could ſuſtain. The governor of Canton ſent an order to him, demanding the cuſtomary fees paid by all ſhips coming into that river: but he maintained the honour of the Britiſh flag, and inſiſted that he would never comply with any ſuch terms. The governor was amazed when he heard in what a cool and deliberate manner the commodore delivered his anſwer; and ſending for him on ſhore, they had a long conference together, the reſult of which was, that aſſiſtance was granted him to refit his ſhip, and take in proper proviſions.

On the fifteenth of April 1743, he left China, with a fixed reſolution of ſailing in queſt of one or more of the Manilla ſhips; and towards the latter end of May, arrived off Cape Eſpiritu Santo, in the iſland of Samal Mare, where the Manilla ſhips always paſs in their voyage to Europe. There he lay by for ſome time; but on the twentieth of June, one of thoſe rich veſſels made her appearance, which added freſh ſpirits to the crew of the Centurion. The Spaniſh captain reſolved not to give up his prize, and accordingly a warm engagement enſued; but the ſuperior ſkill and undaunted courage of the Engliſh overcame every oppoſition: and although ſixty-ſeven of the Spaniards were killed, yet commodore Anſon loſt only two men.

With this rich prize the commodore returned to Canton, where he refitted his ſhip; and being willing to taſte the ſweets of his native country, from which he had been ſo long ſecluded, he ſet ſail for Europe, and on the eleventh of March 1744, arrived ſafe at the Cape of Good Hope. From thence he ſailed for England, and arrived in ſafety at Spithead on the ninth of June, where the treaſure was landed, and conducted to London by thoſe brave ſeamen who had taken it.

The Britiſh fleet in the Mediterranean being in great diſtreſs for want of neceſſary ſtores, ſeveral veſſels were ſent, containing what was neceſſary, under the command of Sir Charles Hardy, who had with him eleven ſhips of the line. The weather obliging him to put into Liſbon, a fleet of French men of war from Breſt, cruiſed near the mouth of the Tagus, in order to intercept him. News of this having been tranſmitted to England, Sir John Balchen, with the admirals Stevens and Martin, were ſent to relieve Sir Charles, and, if poſſible, deſtroy the French fleet. A Dutch fleet of twenty men of war, under the command of admiral Baccherеſt, joined our ſquadron at Spithead; and having ſet ſail on the ſeventh of Auguſt, they caſt anchor near the mouth of the Tagus on the ninth of September. The French admiral retired as ſoon as he heard of their approach; upon which the ſea was left open to Sir Charles, who proceeded on his voyage without interruption.

So far the Britiſh fleet was proſperous; but, upon their return home, in the night of the third of October, they were overtaken by a moſt dreadful ſtorm; and the Victory, carrying one hundred and ten guns, and eſteemed the beſt firſt-rate ſhip in Europe, was daſhed to pieces on a rock near the iſland of Alderney. Sir John Balchen, with all his officers, and every one of the crew, amounting to near twelve hundred men, beſides above fifty young gentlemen of the beſt families in the nation, who had gone volunteers, periſhed, without any perſon's being able to give them the leaſt aſſiſtance. Some other events took place during this year which muſt not be omitted. A ſmall ſquadron was ſent to the Eaſt-Indies, to protect our ſettlements in that part of the world; and many of the French ſhips were taken; ſo that money flowed in abundance among the ſailors.

Another ſquadron, under the command of commodore Warren, was ſtationed to protect the leeward iſlands; and, in conſequence thereof, the French ſhips, deſtined with proviſions for the iſland of Martinico, were taken, and the inhabitants reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs. A moſt dreadful hurricane happened on the twentieth day of October, in the iſland of Jamaica, by which ſix ſhips of war, beſides near a hundred of the merchantmen, were totally deſtroyed. In general, the Britiſh cruizers were extremely fortunate; and although ſome of them were taken, yet, at the concluſion of the year, the balance in our favour againſt Spain was one million nine hundred thouſand pounds; and againſt France, ſeven hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds.

This year died Sarah, the celebrated dutcheſs of Marlborough; a woman who, from a very obſcure original, raiſed herſelf, by intriguing with the political parties, to the higheſt ſtation that a ſubject could arrive at. She poſſeſſed great abilities, with an unbounded ambition; but ſo artful in the uſe of money, that ſhe left behind her a moſt princely eſtate.

The marſhal de Belleiſle and his brother having, on the ſecond of December, in their journey to the Imperial court, ſtopped at a village called Elbingrode, belonging to Hanover, of which they were ignorant, a party of the allied army took them both priſoners, and conveyed them to Stadt, from whence they were ſent over to England. They were treated with that reſpect due to their rank; and being on their parole of honour, were ſuffered to reſide at Windſor, and enjoy all ſorts of public diverſions.

On the twenty-eighth of November, the parliament met; and the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that although nothing of importance, in favour of the allies, had happened, yet he was determined, in conſequence of the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour. He told them, that nothing could ſo much contribute towards promoting the public tranquillity, as unanimity among the members: and concluded by recommending to them the obligations they were under to raiſe the proper ſupplies. Both lords and commons voted, that loyal addreſſes ſhould be preſented to his majeſty; and, in general, the public buſineſs went on without interruption.

A conſiderable change took place in the miniſtry; for the patriots were ſo clamorous againſt lord Carteret, now become earl Granville, in conſequence of his mother's death, that he reſigned all his places; and the duke of Bedford was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury; the ſeals were given to the earl of Harrington, as ſecretary of ſtate; the privy-ſeal to lord Gower: the earl of Cheſterfield was ſent over to the Hague, to prevail with the ſtates-general to act more heartily in ſupport of the common cauſe; and, upon his return, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Dorſet was made preſident of the council, the duke of Devonſhire ſteward of the houſhold, Mr. Doddington treaſurer of the navy, Sir John Phillips was made firſt lord of trade, and Mr. Lyttleton was brought into the treaſury.

A. D. 1745. Theſe noblemen and gentlemen were ſtrongly attached to the intereſts of the queen of Hungary, and therefore it was reſolved to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour; but ſtill there was a general wanting to conduct the army. Some of the oldeſt in command refuſed to take the office upon them, for this reaſon, that the miniſtry would not fail to wreak their vengeance upon them in conſequence of the leaſt miſcarriage: ſo that the duke of Cumberland, youngeſt ſon of his majeſty, was appointed commander in chief of the Britiſh forces. This choice of a prince brought up in the army, and who had, on many occaſions, given diſtinguiſhing proofs of his courage, gave great ſatisfaction to the people in general; and therefore he ſet out for Flanders. Many excellent bills having paſſed both houſes, the king prorogued the parliament on the ſecond of May, and next day embarked at Graveſend, in order to viſit Hanover.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the French were daily gaining ground; and, notwithſtanding ſome conſiderable loſſes, yet they ſeemed to riſe ſuperior to them. The queen of Hungary was much reduced, in conſequence of having ſpent great ſums in ſupporting her army; ſo that the eyes of all Europe were turned upon the event of the war. But many of the plans formed by the contending parties were near being diſconcerted, in conſequence of the death of Charles VII. emperor of Germany, and elector of Bavaria. That monarch, who had been advanced to the imperial dignity by the intrigues of the French, enjoyed little more than the name of emperor; and it may juſtly be ſaid of him, that he died of a broken heart. He had ſeen himſelf neglected, and even deſpiſed, by thoſe who, conſiſtent with the faith of treaties, were bound to ſtand by him. His hereditary dominions were wreſted from him; his enemies triumphed over him in every quarter: he ſaw his family on the brink of ruin; and, unable to ſuſtain the weight of his ſufferings, he ſunk under the load, and died, leaving to ſucceeding monarchs a ſtriking leſſon, never to let ambition blind their underſtanding, to truſt in thoſe in whom no confidence ought to be placed. When he was buried, the globe was carried before him, as if he had been the ſovereign of the whole world, although he had ſcarce a houſe wherein he could reſt in ſafety. Such is the vanity of men's actions and views in general, who love the ſhadow more than the ſubſtance, and even rejoice in their own folly.

The death of the emperor, who had, in a great meaſure, been the cauſe of the war, induced people in general to hope that peace would be reſtored to Europe; but the Engliſh miniſtry refuſed all propoſals of accommodation, thinking that they would have it in their power to diſtreſs the French, by carrying on the war in the moſt vigorous manner. The French, in order to play off their old game of interfering with the election of an emperor, caſt their eyes on the king of Poland, elector of Saxony; but that prince was perſuaded againſt embarking in ſuch a dangerous ſcheme, by his miniſter, count Bruhl, who repreſented to him, that the Poles would never ſubmit to an emperor of Germany, leſt he ſhould deprive them of their privileges: and as the intereſt of the grand duke was very great, ſo, by an act of ſo imprudent a nature, he might even loſe his hereditary dominions. All theſe arguments were enforced from the example of the late emperor; and therefore the king of Poland, inſtead of aſpiring to the imperial crown, did every thing he could to place it on the head of the grand duke.

The next object that France had in view, was to raiſe the king of Pruſſia to the empire; but he was ſo well convinced of their perfidy, that he treated all their propoſals of that nature with the moſt ſovereign contempt. On the other hand, the queen of Hungary, who had ſtill ſome hopes of recovering Sileſia, would hearken to no terms of accommodation; and in that ſhe was ſtrongly encouraged by the Engliſh miniſtry, who made her the moſt liberal promiſes, that nothing ſhould be wanting to enable her to regain ſuch of her territories as had been ſeized by the French, and, at the ſame time, to raiſe her huſband, the grand duke, to the imperial throne.

Lewis XV. finding all his propoſals rejected, and not ſeeing the moſt diſtant appearance of putting an end to the war, reſolved to puſh it on, with the utmoſt vigour, in Flanders; and accordingly ſent marſhal Saxe to take upon him the command of the army, conſiſting of about ſeventy-ſix thouſand men, aſſiſted with a large train of artillery.

To animate the troops, the French king ſet out, accompanied by his ſon the dauphin, then about ſixteen years of age, and arrived in Flanders before the two armies could come to a general engagement. The duke of Cumberland, juſt entering into the twenty-fourth year of his age, arrived at the Hague on the ſeventh of April; and having concerted proper meaſures with the ſtates-general, ſet out for Bruſſels, where he found prince Waldeck, general of the Dutch forces, and the count Konigſegg, the commander in chief of the Auſtrians. The duke had made the art of war his ſtudy from his moſt early youth; he was not afraid of the greateſt dangers; and although he knew that the French were ſuperior to him in numbers, yet ſuch was his opinion of the undaunted courage of the Engliſh, that he ſeemed to deſpiſe the French, who were commanded by ſome of the moſt experienced generals of that age. Some of them had ſerved above forty years in the army; they had reduced the art of war to a ſcience; and even the ſubaltern officers were able to conduct any engagement whatever.

Marſhal Saxe, one of the greateſt generals that ever commanded an army, was not ignorant of the youthful ardour of the duke of Cumberland; but, at the ſame time, knowing that the troops under him were men of the moſt invincible courage, reſolved to obtain by ſtratagem what he could not in a regular engagement. Accordingly, for ſome days, he marched from one place to another, concealing his real intentions; but, on the twenty-fourth day of April, he ſat down before Tournay, a ſtrong city on the river Schelde, defended by a garriſon of eight thouſand Dutch troops, under the command of baron Dorth. Tournay had been fortified by the great Vauban, and was eſteemed the ſtrongeſt of all the frontier towns belonging to the Dutch; ſo that the duke of Cumberland imagined, if he could raiſe the ſiege, it would be of the utmoſt ſervice to the common cauſe. Accordingly, he marched from Bruſſels, and on the twenty-ninth of April, came within muſket-ſhot of the French army, juſt as marſhal Saxe had expected; for the whole was a ſcheme laid by the French to draw the allies into a ſnare.

The French army was ſtrongly encamped; and between them and the allies was the village of Fontenoy, about three miles ſouth-eaſt of Tournay. On the twenty-eighth of April, the French king rode from the city of Douay, and took up his head-quarters at the bridge of Calonne, near the village of St. Antoin, where there was a ſtrong battery of cannon. The bridge of Calonne was guarded by ſeveral battalions, both of regulars and militia; ſo that every precaution was taken by the French, while the allies depended too much on perſonal courage.

That part of the allied army compoſed of Engliſh forces was employed to drive the French from their advanced poſts, which they did with great courage; but this only ſerved to make the enemy more formidable, by being more united. As the allies were now in poſſeſſion of the ground from which they had driven the French, they drew up on it, and a council of war being called, it was reſolved upon by the majority to engage the next morning. This opinion, however, was diſliked by the oldeſt generals, who thought it much better to act on the defenſive; but the opinion of the young ones was embraced.

As this was one of the moſt obſtinate and bloody engagements that we meet with in hiſtory, ſo it is neceſſary that an account ſhould be given of it in the moſt particular manner.

The Engliſh and Hanoverians compoſed the right wing, and were drawn up in four lines, having the village of Vezon in their front. The Dutch, with part of the Auſtrians, compoſed the left wing, conſiſting of three columns, and they advanced into the plain of Fontenoy. Prince Waldeck, with ſome of the beſt Dutch troops, propoſed to attack Fontenoy; and the duke of Cumberland, in order to ſecond the prince, ordered general Ingoldſby to attack a fort near the village of Vezon, on which was a ſtrong battery of cannon. Sir John (ſince earl) Ligonier, commanded the right wing of the infantry, and Sir James Campbell was ordered to cover him, by extending the cavalry as far as poſſible along the plain of Fontenoy.

The courage of the Britiſh forces on this memorable day is incredible; for at the firſt charge they drove the French beyond their lines, and would have penetrated into the center of their firſt line, had not marſhal Saxe opened a concealed battery which ſwept off whole ranks at a time. The intrepidity of the Britiſh foot ſtruck the French with amazement; and there is not the leaſt reaſon to doubt, but they would have been maſters of the field had not ſome circumſtances conſpired to deprive them of that glory.

General Ingoldſby was ſo dilatory in attacking the fort at Vezon, that marſhal Saxe had time to ſtrengthen it both with troops and cannon. But the moſt fatal circumſtance was the Dutch troops under prince Waldeck, for although he led them thrice on to the attack of Fontenoy, yet they as often fled, by which the Auſtrians were left expoſed to the fire of the enemy. Had Ingoldſby taken the fort at Vezon, the French king and his ſon, the dauphin, would have been made priſoners of war. But ſtill the courage of the Engliſh was the moſt ſurprizing that can be imagined. The broken lines were filled up from the rear, and although once put into ſome diſorder, yet when rallied by the duke, they advanced a ſecond time with more ardour than ever. In this manner both armies continued on the firſt day of May, from five in the morning till about three in the afternoon; but the Engliſh, who received no aſſiſtance from the left wing, were ſo galled by the enemy, who, in conſequence of the cowardice of the Dutch, took them in front and flank. Their numbers were now greatly reduced, and the French were raiſing a new battery, when orders were given for the allies to retreat. This they performed in ſuch excellent order, that ſome of the French cavalry, who attempted to purſue them, had a whole regiment deſtroyed. Next day the allies marched to Aeth; but ſuch of the brave ſoldiers and officers as had been wounded, were obliged to be left to the care of the enemy, who treated them in the moſt tender manner.

Such was the memorable battle of Fontenoy, which was of no other ſervice to the nation, but that of making an oſtentatious diſplay of courage of the Engliſh and Hanoverians, who both fought in the moſt amazing manner; while the Dutch, to their everlaſting diſgrace, procured the loſs of the battle. The allies loſt in this action two brave generals, namely, Sir James Campbell, and major-general Ponſonby, three colonels, a great number of ſubaltern officers, with about eight thouſand men. The loſs of the French cannot be well aſcertained: but it muſt be conſiderable, becauſe ſeven of their generals were killed, and four others died ſoon afterwards of their wounds.

Baron Dorth, the Dutch commander in Tournay, held out that important fortreſs againſt the whole French army till the twenty-firſt day of June, when he was obliged to capitulate, and obtained the moſt honourable terms. A detachment of four thouſand Engliſh and Hanoverians were ſent to reinforce the garriſon in the city of Ghent, but one thouſand of them were cut off. At the ſame time the French took the cities of Aeth, Dendermond, Oudenarde, and Newport, with the important town of Oſtend; after which Lewis XV. the French king, returned in triumph to Paris.

It was impoſſible for the duke of Cumberland to do any thing more than act on the defenſive; and to crown our misfortunes, an unnatural rebellion broke out at home, which obliged the duke of Cumberland to return to England, leaving the victorious marſhal Saxe in poſſeſſion of the greateſt part of the Auſtrian Netherlands.

In Germany the French had ſent an army to the aſſiſtance of the young elector of Bavaria; but the Auſtrians had been ſo ſtrongly reinforced that the elector was obliged to leave his capital city of Munich, and take ſhelter in Augſburgh, while all that his army could do was to act on the defenſive, till ſuch time as reinforcements came to their aſſiſtance.

Count Traun, with an army of thirty thouſand Auſtrians, marched from Bohemia towards Frankfort, in order to drive out the French, under the command of the prince of Conti; alledging, as a reaſon, that there could not be a free election of an emperor, till all foreign troops were driven out of the empire. Count Bathiani joined count Traun, and the whole Auſtrian army, amounting to near ſeventy thouſand men, took the field, and the grand duke having taken upon himſelf the chief command, marched againſt the prince of Conti, and obliged him to repaſs the Rhine with very great loſs.

The French being thus driven out of Frankfort, ſeven ambaſſadors, from ſo many electors, aſſembled in the Imperial college, to make choice of an emperor; but thoſe of Brandenburg and the Palatinate were not preſent. The election fell on the grand duke of Tuſcany, huſband to the queen of Hungary; and on the twenty-fourth of September the emperor was crowned with the uſual ceremonies. This important event, ſo much for the benefit of the princes in Germany, was, in a great meaſure, brought about by the unwearied aſſiduity of his Britannic majeſty, who left nothing undone to bring over the electors to the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, and prevailed upon the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, to withdraw his troops from the French ſervice, and enter them into Britiſh pay.

The king of Pruſſia, who had ſuffered ſo much the preceding year, would have liſtened to terms of accommodation, eſpecially as he found that he had been deceived by the French; but the houſe of Auſtria rejected every offer. The Auſtrians had taken ſome towns in Sileſia; but no ſooner had the king of Pruſſia learned that his propoſal had been rejected, than his indignation was fired, and all his military ſkill rekindled in his breaſt. In a ſudden he attacked the Auſtrians, and drove them from one poſt to another with great ſlaughter, beſides making many priſoners. At Glatz ſix thouſand Pruſſians, under general Lehwald, attacked twelve thouſand Auſtrians commanded by general Helfrick, and totally defeated them. At Ratiber, three thouſand Auſtrians were made priſoners of war; every thing gave way to the victorious Pruſſians to the ſurprize of all Europe. People in general imagined that he had been too much diſpirited by his loſſes to have undertaken things of ſuch importance; but there are particular reaſons that call forth great minds to action.

But all theſe advantages obtained by the Pruſſian monarch, were trifles to what he performed afterwards. His real character had been hitherto concealed, and his taking Sileſia was aſcribed by the Auſtrians rather to a fortuitous concurrence of events, than either to real courage or military ſkill.

In May, prince Charles of Lorrain being joined by the forces under the command of the prince of Saxe-Weiſſenfells, marched from Bohemia, and encamped on thoſe mountains which ſeparate that kingdom from Sileſia. The king of Pruſſia had taken all the precaution that the greateſt general could uſe, in order to augment his army, and ſecure his garriſons; and about the middle of June, he found himſelf at the head of eighty-four thouſand men, all diſciplined in the beſt manner, and accuſtomed to the greateſt hardſhips that can be imagined. With theſe men he reſolved to attack prince Charles, who had advanced to Friedburg; and for that purpoſe ordered Du Moulin, his general, to march, at the head of fifteen thouſand men, to make as if he intended to march towards Breſlaw, which was done that prince Charles might be led into a ſnare. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect; for the Auſtrians being taken off their guard, and lulled into ſecurity, the Pruſſians attacked them with ſuch fury, that although prince Charles and the prince of Saxe-Weiſſenfells did all that lay in their power to procure a victory, yet the military abilities of the king of Pruſſia bore down every oppoſition, and the Auſtrians were totally defeated, with the loſs of five thouſand men killed, and near ſeven thouſand taken priſoners.

His Britannic majeſty was then at Hanover; and being afraid that the king of Pruſſia would too much diſtreſs the houſe of Auſtria, entered into a treaty with him, which was concluded at Hanover in the month of Auguſt. By this treaty Great-Britain engaged to ſupport the king of Pruſſia in his conqueſt of Sileſia; but the courts of Vienna and Dreſden having proteſted againſt it, the king of Pruſſia marched into Luſatia, and having taken poſſeſſion of Gorlitz, forced prince Charles of Lorrain to take ſhelter in Bohemia.

The prince of Anhalt-Deſſau, one of the Pruſſian generals, entered Saxony at the ſame time, and made himſelf maſter of the city of Leipſic; while the king of Poland, afraid of being made a priſoner in his capital city, left Dreſden, and took refuge in Prague. Prince Lobkowitz, with a body of Saxons, attempted to force the Pruſſian lines, but he was defeated with great loſs, and Dreſden, the capital of Saxony, was obliged to ſubmit to the victorious king of Pruſſia. The king of Poland ſeeing the Pruſſians in poſſeſſion of his capital, was obliged to make peace on the beſt terms he could, and the queen of Hungary conſented to give up all future claim to Sileſia.

In Italy, during this year, the war had been very unfavourable to the queen of Hungary, and her ally, the king of Sardinia. In the month of April, count Gages croſſed the Appenine mountains, in order to join the army under the command of Don Philip, in Lombardy; and although he was oppoſed by ſeveral parties of Auſtrians, yet he proceeded as far as Lucca, and placed a Spaniſh garriſon in that city.

From Lucca count Gages continued his march to the eaſtern part of the Genoeſe territories: and on the fourteenth day of June, Don Philip, who had received freſh reinforcements from Catalonia, met him near the city of Genoa. Upon the junction of the two armies, the republic of Genoa declared in favour of France and Spain againſt the houſe of Auſtria and the king of Sardinia; and the Auſtrian general Schuylemberg found himſelf under the neceſſity of marching towards Milan, the capital city of Lombardy.

Count Gages reduced the fort of Serravalle, while Don Philip opened a paſſage to Alexandria, and obliged the Auſtrian general to retire beyond the river Tanaro. Pavia, Tortona, and ſome other places, ſubmitted to count Gages; and Don Philip took the rich city of Milan, with Parma and Placentia; while the king of Sardinia was obliged to ſeek ſhelter at Valenza, on the other ſide of the Po, a rapid river that oftentimes overflows its banks, and lays the neighbouring country under water. The city of Alexandria ſubmitted to the Spaniards, after a ſiege of twelve days: and ſoon after, prince Lichtenſtein was ſent to command the Auſtrian forces in Italy, but nothing of any importance was done by him; for the united forces of the French, Spaniards, and Neapolitans, carried all before them; and the Auſtrian dominions in Italy, as well as the greateſt part of the king of Sardinia's territories, were taken.

With reſpect to the naval affairs of England during this year, they began, in ſome meaſure, to wear a more promiſing aſpect than before. Admiral Rowley had been ſent into the Mediterranean, to command in the room of Matthews; and he, during the ſummer, bombarded Genoa, and ſeveral other places; while the Engliſh privateers took ſeveral capital prizes; all which contributed towards inſpiring the ſeamen with freſh courage. But the moſt important naval tranſaction was the reduction of Cape Breton, in North-America, a place of great importance, which the French had been at great expence in fortifying, and which they looked upon as one of their moſt valuable colonies. The ſcheme had been projected by the people of Boſton in New-England; and Sir Peter Warren, who had been ſtationed near the leeward iſlands, was ordered to ſail for North-America, to aſſiſt ſuch forces as were then in New-England in the intended expedition. Accordingly, on the ſixth of April this year, Sir Peter ſet ſail, and ſoon after landed at Cauſo, having under his command ten ſhips of the line; and having taken on board ſix thouſand men from New-England, he came to an anchor at Gabaron, about four miles ſouth of Louiſbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. The ground between the fort and the place where they landed was the moſt dangerous to paſs over that could be imagined; but the forces ſent from New-England ſurmounted all difficulties, and, by the moſt unwearied diligence and perſeverance, formed two camps, in order to carry on the attack. One of theſe camps was on the north, and the other on the ſouth ſide of the town; and the fort had a battery of thirty-five pieces of cannon, which commanded the entry into the harbour. The walls and ramparts mounted ſixty-four great guns, beſides ſixteen large mortars; and the garriſon, beſides the inhabitants, contained twelve hundred regular troops, under the command of M. Chambon. At the weſt gate of the town, was a ſtrong draw-bridge, ſecured by a battery of ſixteen guns, and near it was another battery of thirty-four guns. The New-England forces were only raw, undiſciplined troops; few of them had ever ſeen a military engagement: but notwithſtanding the almoſt unſurmountable difficulties that ſeemed to oppoſe them, yet they diſplayed ſuch courage as would have done honour to the beſt regulated forces in the world. They only waited for orders; and no ſooner had they received them, than they attacked the grand battery with ſuch fury, that the enemy was forced to abandon it, and that, in a great meaſure, contributed towards procuring them the victory. In the mean time, the Engliſh fleet blocked up the harbour, ſo that neither men nor proviſions could be brought to the beſieged; while ſeveral French ſhips, laden with ſtores and ammunition, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and were condemned as legal prizes.

The New-England forces, who carried on the ſiege, were plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of freſh proviſions; but the ſervice on the ſouth ſide of the town was attended with many difficulties; for moſt of the cannon deſigned to be placed on the battlements, were obliged to be dragged above two miles, through very marſhy grounds; in ſome parts almoſt impaſſabe. Perſeverance and courage, however, ſurmounted every difficulty; and the troops that had been conſidered as unfit for action in a regular manner, performed wonders. Several batteries were erected on the riſing ground near the place, from whence red-hot bullets were diſcharged into the town, and the governor not ſeeing any proſpect of aſſiſtance, ſurrendered the place, and with the garriſon, who all engaged not to bear arms againſt Britain, during the ſpace of twelve months, were conveyed to Rochfort in France. This was a moſt valuable acquiſition to Great Britain; and his majeſty was ſo ſenſible of it, that he conferred ſeveral honours upon the officers. The inhabitants of New England acquired immortal honour, and convinced thoſe in power, that courage, joined with prudence, is able to accompliſh any thing.

It is now time for us to turn our thoughts to Great Britain, where a rebellion broke out that threatened immediate deſtruction to our civil and religious liberties. But although many individuals were ruined by it, yet in the end it was attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences to the nation. It awakened the Britiſh legiſlature to take into conſideration the nature of the feudal law in Scotland, and by putting an end to the hereditary juriſdictions, by which the power of the landholders over their tenants was deſtroyed, the royal family of Hanover was more firmly eſtabliſhed on the Britiſh throne than ever, while thoſe who had been conſidered as ſlaves were now treated as free members of the community.

We have already ſeen in what manner Charles, the eldeſt ſon of the pretender, attempted to invade England during the laſt year, and it is aſſerted, that upon his return home to his father at Rome, he was adviſed to lay aſide all thoughts of engaging in an enterprize likely to be attended with inſurmountable difficulties, and if failing of ſucceſs muſt involve many families in ruin. Such was the advice given Charles by his father, who had failed in an attempt of the like nature; but the young adventurer, whoſe mind was full of romantic notions, and who had been hurried on by the advice of ſome needy fugitives, reſolved to try his fortune for the recovery of that crown which he looked upon as the right of his family. The French miniſtry looked on the whole as a Don Quixote expedition, and however earneſt they were to ſee Great Britain diſtreſſed, yet ſuch were their notions of the ſuperiority gained by them in Flanders, that all Charles could procure from them was only one ſhip of war to carry him over to Scotland, where he doubted not of meeting with many friends to eſpouſe his cauſe. Accordingly, he ſet ſail in a ſmall frigate from Port St. Lazaro, on the fourteenth of July, and was joined by the Elizabeth, a French man of war of ſixty guns, which was to ſerve as a convoy. Their deſign was to have ſailed round Ireland, and then land in the Weſtern Iſlands of Scotland; but happening to fall in with the Lion, an Engliſh man of war of fifty guns, a deſperate engagement enſued, and the French ſhip was ſo much diſabled, that ſhe was obliged to ſet ſail for Breſt, where ſhe arrived in a very ſhattered condition. The frigate, in which was the young chevalier, the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Thomas Sherridan, and ſome few others, made her eſcape during the engagement, and ſailing up the channel came to an anchor on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month, landed at Moidart, between the iſlands of Sky and Mull, where he was kindly received by Mr. M'Donald of Moidart, and concealed in his houſe till notice of his arrival was diſperſed among the reſt of the clans. Notice of his ſailing from France was given, and a reward of thirty thouſand pounds offered for apprehending him; but few people would believe that he had landed, becauſe they did not imagine that any but a madman would have engaged in ſo romantic an expedition.

On the third of Auguſt his Britannic majeſty arrived in London from his German dominions, to the great ſatisfaction of his loyal ſubjects, who received him with every demonſtration of joy. Every precaution was taken by his majeſty to cruſh the rebellion before it had ſpread too far. The lord-mayor of London was ordered to keep the trained-bands in readineſs; the high-ſteward of Weſtminſter arrayed the militia; orders for the ſame purpoſe were ſent to the lords-lieutenants of the different counties; nine battalions of the army were ordered over from Flanders; and ſix thouſand Dutch troops were demanded in conſequence of former treaties.

As ſoon as it was known at Edinburgh that the pretender's ſon had landed, Sir John Cope, commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, marched to oppoſe the rebels; but they gave him the ſlip; and on the fourth of September arrived at Perth, where they proclaimed the pretender by the name of James III. and a commiſſion was read, importing, that Charles his eldeſt ſon, was to act as regent for him. There the young chevalier was joined by lord George Murray, the perſon called the duke of Perth, lord Nairn, lord Strathallen, and many other perſons of diſtinction, with their dependents and tenants, ſo that the rebel army was now about two thouſand ſtrong; but it muſt be remembered that not one fifth of them had either arms or ammunition. From Perth they marched ſouth-weſt to the banks of the Forth, a few miles above Stirling, where they croſſed that river, and on the ſeventeenth of September took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh without the leaſt oppoſition. Had the magiſtrates of that city been unanimous in their opinions, the rebels might have been kept out till the arrival of the forces under Cope; but they ſpent the time in unneceſſary deliberations, without doing any thing of importance.

On the ſame day that the rebels took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh, general Cope, who had embarked his forces at Aberdeen, landed at Dunbar, twenty-ſeven miles eaſt of Edinburgh, where he was joined by two regiments of dragoons under the command of the brave colonel Gardiner. The rebels, knowing that no time was to be loſt, marched to meet general Cope, and on the twentieth of September encamped at a place called Tranent, about ſeven miles eaſt of Edinburgh. Next morning about day break, the rebels, who had got about two thouſand ſets of arms at Edinburgh, attacked the royal army with ſuch fury, that they were obliged to give way, and many of them were made priſoners. In this engagement colonel Gardiner, a man of great piety and a valiant ſoldier, loſt his life, after he had done every thing in defence of the rights of his country; and the baggage, arms, and ammunition falling into the hands of the rebels, they became ſo much elated that they doubted not of carrying every thing before them. The conſternation that took place among all ranks of people when the news of this engagement was made public, is ſcarce poſſible to be conceived; but to the honour of the Britiſh ſubjects in general, both in England and Scotland, they gave their ſovereign all the proofs of their loyalty that could be deſired.

General Gueſt, an officer of great knowledge and courage, commanded in the caſtle of Edinburgh, to which the archives of the city and the money in the public offices had been removed; and that caſtle being a place of great ſtrength, the rebels could not get poſſeſſion of it.

Marſhal Wade, at the head of about fourteen thouſand men, marched northwards into Yorkſhire, and from thence to Newcaſtle on Tyne, where he encamped; but as moſt of the men had contracted dangerous diſorders in Flanders, ſo the greateſt part of the army was ſeized with ſickneſs, and rendered incapable of acting, eſpecially as the ſeaſon was then extremely cold.

On the ſixteenth of October the parliament met, and his majeſty in his ſpeech told them, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland, and therefore he doubted not but they would aſſiſt him in reſtoring peace to the nation, and in ſupporting the honour of his crown and dignity. Addreſſes containing the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty were preſented by both houſes to his majeſty; and the commons, in order to provide for the public ſafety, ſuſpended the habeas corpus act, upon which ſeveral ſuſpected perſons were taken into cuſtody. Admiral Vernon was ſent to command a fleet in the Downs, there being great reaſon to ſuſpect that the French would attempt to invade the ſouth of Kent, and his ſhips ſeized ſeveral French veſſels which were carrying arms and ammunition to the pretender in Scotland. This was ſtriking at the root of the rebellion, and from ſuch circumſtances our miniſtry were enabled to form ſome notion of their ſtrength, and the methods to be uſed in oppoſing them.

The chevalier, finding it impracticable to ſeize the caſtle of Edinburgh, marched towards England at the head of five thouſand men; for after the defeat of general Cope, his army had increaſed conſiderably. On the twelfth of November the rebel army attacked the city of Carliſle, and in three days it ſurrendered; all the arms and ammunition falling into their hands, and there the pretender was proclaimed. Thus ſucceſsful, and marſhal Wade not having been able to get up in time to oppoſe them, they marched ſouthward to Preſton, where they arrived without any moleſtation; and on the twenty-ninth made their public entry into Mancheſter. At Preſton and Mancheſter the pretender was again proclaimed; and in the latter place a regiment was raiſed for him, and the command thereof given to one Mr. Townly, a Lancaſhire gentleman, who had been ſome years in the French ſervice. It is impoſſible to expreſs the conſternation of the people in London, when they found that the rebels had got ſo far ſouthward; and therefore the duke of Cumberland, who had returned from Flanders, was ſent down to oppoſe them.

The rebels, having marched from Mancheſter, arrived at Derby on the fourth of December; but finding that the duke of Cumberland was advanced as far as Newcaſtle under line in Staffordſhire, they ſuddenly retreated and marched northward. The duke purſued them with the cavalry and one thouſand foot, whom he mounted on ſuch horſes as could be procured in the country; while marſhal Wade detached a body of horſe to ſecond the duke's operations, under the command of general Oglethorpe. The royal army attacked the rear of the rebels at a village called Clifton in Weſtmoreland, on the eighteenth of December, and made them retire with conſiderable loſs; and on the thirtieth the duke, having driven the rebels into Scotland, retook the city of Carliſle, and ſent the garriſon to different priſons.

A. D. 1746. The rebels having marched as far as Stirling, one of the moſt important forts in Scotland, being ſituated where the High and Lowlands meet, attacked the caſtle, then commanded by general Blakeney; but they had neither artillery nor engines that could be of ſervice to them in conducting ſuch an enterprize. In the mean time, general Hawley, who had advanced from Edinburgh to Linlithgow, reſolved to drive the rebels from Stirling; but on the ſeventeenth of January both armies met at Falkirk-moor, about ſix miles ſouth-eaſt from Stirling. There the rebels behaved in the ſame manner as at Preſton-Pans, where general Cope was defeated; for they fell upon the royal army with ſuch fury, that Hawley was obliged to retreat, leaving behind him great part of his baggage and artillery. Indeed there was ſuch a ſtorm of ſnow, wind and rain, that blew in the faces of the royal army, that many of their muſkets would not fire; and the dragoons, of which there were three regiments, fled at the firſt onſet, and breaking through the firſt line of the foot, threw the whole into the utmoſt confuſion.

However trifling the ſucceſs obtained by the rebels was, yet it gave them freſh ſpirits, and becauſe the city of Glaſgow had raiſed a regiment of militia to oppoſe them, they ſent a party under the command of the earl of Kilmarnock, and fined the inhabitants thirty thouſand pounds. News of what they called a victory, was ſent over to France, and publiſhed in the Paris gazette; but the duke of Cumberland, who had returned from Carliſle to London, in conſequence of giving his opinion in the privy-council, was ſent down to Scotland to take upon him the command of the army, conſiſting of fourteen battalions, and two regiments of dragoons, beſides about five hundred loyal Highlanders, who had been raiſed in Argyleſhire, by colonel John Campbell.

When the duke arrived at Edinburgh he found the army in much better order than he expected; and on the laſt day of January he began his march towards Stirling; but the rebels retreated at his approach. They were divided in their councils, diſpirited becauſe the French had not aſſiſted them according to their expectations, and knowing that the royal army would be too powerful for them, they reſolved to retire to the Highlands, imagining that there they might recruit their forces, and make a freſh ſtand. From Stirling they continued their march to the north, in the moſt precipitate and irregular manner; but ſome ſmall advantages obtained by them over ſeveral detached parties, inſpired them with freſh courage, and enabled them to hope that it was ſtill poſſible for them to repair their loſs.

The duke of Cumberland marched after them with as much expedition as the ſeaſon would permit; and on the firſt of April he arrived at Aberdeen, where he was informed that they had ſeized a ſloop in the harbour of Montroſe, and ſent her to France for freſh ſupplies.

At Aberdeen he was obliged to remain till ſuch time as the river Spey was fordable, becauſe in that ſeaſon it overflows its banks; but on the eighth of April he began his march, and croſſed that river on the twelfth without any oppoſition from the rebels, who might have obſtructed their paſſage had they not been reduced to a ſtate of infatuation. In the mean time, the earl of Cromartie, who had been ſent into Caithneſs to raiſe recruits for the rebel army, was attacked by a party of militia, and both he and his ſon made priſoners.

At Nairn the duke received intelligence that the rebels had advanced to Culloden near Inverneſs, and therefore he marched with the utmoſt expedition. On the morning of the ſixteenth, the royal army, having ſtruck their tents, came up with the rebels about noon; but their numbers had been very much leſſened in conſequence of deſertion, ſickneſs, and a variety of other events, ſo that it was in a manner impoſſible for them to oppoſe the duke with any probability of ſucceſs. About one o'clock both armies were drawn up in order of battle; and the rebels, in their uſual manner, attacked the duke's forces with the utmoſt fury; but fury of the moſt undaunted courage, is of little ſervice when oppoſed by troops regularly diſciplined.

The royal army had been drawn up with ſo much order and regularity, that the rebels ſoon gave way, and within the compaſs of forty minutes, twelve hundred of them were killed. The dragoons, who flanked the infantry, advanced even to the rear of the rebel army, and meeting in the center, nothing was to be ſeen but confuſion and bloodſhed. The remainder of the rebels fled in great diſorder; but the duke of Kingſton's light horſe being ordered to purſue them, a dreadful carnage enſued; for all thoſe who offered to ſurrender priſoners, were put to the ſword; an act of cruelty that would ſtand unjuſtified, were it not for the beneficial conſequences that flowed from it. Indeed the ſtate of public affairs rendered it in a manner abſolutely neceſſary to make uſe of the moſt violent methods, in order to impreſs the minds of the people with a reverential reſpect to the government, without which no ſort of ſubordination among the different ranks in ſociety could be maintained.

For ſome time the duke remained with the army in the Highlands till the public peace was reſtored, and then he ſet out for London, where he was received by his royal father with all the marks of parental reſpect, and by the people with the greateſt acclamations of joy. The unfortunate adventurer, who had involved ſo many families in ruin, wandered about in diſguiſe, ſubjected to all the miſeries ariſing from hunger and nakedneſs, till the month of Auguſt following, when he got on board a French ſhip, and was landed at Reſcourt, near Morlaix, on the coaſt of Britany.

Such was the end of this unnatural rebellion, carried on by ſome diſcontented perſons in favour of a popiſh pretender; and ſome noblemen and gentlemen being concerned in it, it was neceſſary that their lives ſhould atone for their crimes. Accordingly, ſome of them were attainted, among whom were the lords Kilmarnock and Balmerino; but Cromarty had intereſt enough to procure a pardon, under certain reſtrictions. Some others of leſſer note ſuffered; and in the beginning of the following year, lord Lovat, the life and ſoul of the rebellion, was beheaded on Tower-hill.

During the remainder of this year, the war raged with great fury on the continent: for although an emperor had been choſen, yet the acquiſition made by the French in the Netherlands alarmed all Germany, while the Dutch looked for nothing leſs than immediate deſtruction. The Dutch in general conſidered it neceſſary, that a perſon ſhould be made choice of to conduct the affairs of the republic, and none ſeemed more proper than the prince of Orange, who had married the princeſs royal of England. But a ſtrong party oppoſed that motion, and the command of the army was a ſecond time conferred on prince Waldeck, a German, and a man of known courage; but as he was not a native of the country, ſo it could not be ſuppoſed that he would act like one naturally attached to the republic.

Early in the ſpring, the French king took the field, accompanied by marſhal Saxe and ſeveral other generals: and the allies, under count Bathiani, not being able to oppoſe them, retreated to Breda, the capital city of Dutch Brabant, leaving Antwerp expoſed to the enemy, who, in a few days, took poſſeſſion of it. A detachment from the French army, under the command of the prince of Conti, was ſent to inveſt Mons, a city of great ſtrength; but the garriſon behaved with ſo much bravery, that notwithſtanding the ſuperior numbers of the French, yet the place held out till the latter end of July, when they were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. So rapid were the French conqueſts after the battle of Fontenoy, that every place gave way to them almoſt as ſoon as they approached; and Lewis XV. publiſhed an edict, whereby he ordered to be annexed to his dominions all thoſe provinces that had been taken from his kingdom by the treaty of Utrecht. All the towns of ſtrength in the Auſtrian Netherlands had ſubmitted to the French, except Namur, a ſtrong fort ſituated on the confluence of the Maeſe and the Sambre; and that the French reſolved to bring under ſubjection as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit.

On the eighteenth of July, the allied army being reinforced with the Heſſians that had been ſent over to Scotland, and alſo with a ſtrong body of Auſtrians, reſolved to remain no longer unconcerned ſpectators, but to oppoſe the French with courage and perſeverance. Prince Charles of Lorrain, who had marched towards the Netherlands, knew the importance of Namur, and therefore he drew up the allied army, which he had now taken under his command, on an eminence in ſight of the French forces.

Nothing could have been better contrived than the meaſures taken by prince Charles, ſo far as he was able to act conſiſtent with the inferiority of his army to that of the enemy. But the count Lowendahl having taken Huy, where the allies had their magazine, the prince was obliged to retire to the north of the Maeſe, and leave Namur expoſed to the enemy. Accordingly the trenches before it were opened on the ſecond of September, and the ſiege carried on by thirty-five thouſand French till the twenty-third, when the garriſon, conſiſting of four thouſand Auſtrians, after making a brave defence, were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The allied army, which lay encamped near Maeſtricht, being joined by Sir John Ligonier, with ſeveral battalions from Britain, prince Charles reſolved not to remain any longer inactive, but to venture on an engagemrnt with the French; but count Saxe perceived his intention, and having fortified his camp in the ſtrongeſt manner, the allied army was obliged to return once more to Maeſtricht. To that place they were followed by the French, who had been reinforced with that part of the army which had been employed againſt Namur. The allies now finding that an engagement was inevitable, prepared to meet the enemy, who had been drawn up in three columns, with artillery in the front; and about noon a moſt dreadful cannonading began, which did great execution on both ſides. At laſt the allies, after having done every thing that could have been performed by brave men, were obliged to abandon the field, and retreat to Maeſtricht: but the French purchaſed the victory extremely dear, without being able to reap any material advantages from it.

In Italy, the Auſtrian and Sardinian forces performed many ſignal actions. Don Philip was obliged to abandon Milan; and the king of Sardinia having retaken all the Piedmonteſe forts, advanced towards Genoa, in order to join the Auſtrian army. This brought on a moſt bloody engagement, in which above nine thouſand of the French and Spaniards were killed, and ſix thouſand taken priſoners; while the Auſtrians did not loſe above four thouſand. Soon after this battle, the Auſtrian forces were joined by thoſe of the king of Sardinia, who took upon him the command in chief, and reſolved, if poſſible, to drive the French and Spaniards from their entrenchments, which he effected; for they were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of eight thouſand men, beſides their cannon and ammunition.

Don Philip, in conſequence of theſe repeated loſſes, found his army reduced to thirty thouſand men, with which he returned to Provence, and put them into winter quarters. Nor was it much better with the count de Gages, whoſe forces ſuffered conſiderably; and the court of Madrid was ſo enraged, that he was recalled, and the command given to the marquis de las Minas.

On the fourth of December, the ſenate of Genoa delivered up their capital city to the Auſtrians, who placed in it a garriſon of only ſixteen hundred men, under the command of the marquis de Botta. Had the Auſtrians, on this occaſion, obſerved a conduct conſiſtent with humanity, they might have remained maſters of Genoa; but their cruelty, in exacting taxes of an exorbitant nature, drove the people to deſpair, and then awakened in them the laſt remaining ſpark of courage. They roſe in ſuch numbers upon the garriſon, that they killed many of them; and being joined by the peaſants in the neighbouring country, the whole Auſtrian army was driven out of the territories of Genoa.

In the latter end of this year, died Philip, king of Spain, a man of a peaceable diſpoſition, but hurried on to war by the intrigues of the French king, and the ambition of his queen, who was a mortal enemy to the Auſtrian family. Much about the ſame time, died Chriſtian VI. king of Denmark, a prince beloved by his ſubjects; and was ſucceeded by his ſon Frederick, who had married the princeſs Louiſa, daughter of his Britannic majeſty, and who reigned many years afterwards, rather as a tender parent than an abſolute ſovereign.

With reſpect to naval affairs during this year, little was done to promote the intereſt of Great-Britain. In the Eaſt-Indies were ſix ſhips of the line, who prevented the French from ſeizing on our ſettlements: but in America nothing of importance happened. An attempt was made by an Engliſh ſquadron, of ſixteen ſhips of the line, under the command of admiral Leſtock, and eight battalions of land-forces, commanded by general Sinclair, to take poſſeſſion of Port l'Orient, on the coaſt of Britany; but they were driven back by the French, who had notice of their intentions.

On the eighteenth of November, the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech, told them, that it had been propoſed to hold a conference at Breda; but as it could not be known what would be the iſſue, he was determined to proſecute the war with vigour; and therefore the commons were given to underſtand, that it would be neceſſary for them to grant the ſupplies as ſoon as poſſible. Both houſes were unanimous in preſenting the moſt loyal and affectionate addreſſes to his majeſty; and the commons granted him nine millions, four hundred and twenty-five thouſand, two hundred and fifty-four thouſand pounds, for defraying the expences of the war. On the other hand, the king, in order to ingratiate himſelf with the people, propoſed to reduce three regiments of horſe to dragoons, and two troops of his life-guards, by which a conſiderable ſum of money would be ſaved: and ſo ſenſible were the commons of the king's œconomy in reducing theſe unneceſſary forces, that they received his meſſage with the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude, and both houſes preſented him with addreſſes on the occaſion.

In the mean time, it appeared evident that the French had no intentions of making peace; for their late ſucceſſes had made them ſo arrogant, that they would hearken to no terms of accommodation, but ſuch as ſhould be dictated by themſelves. Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, who had ſucceeded his father, began to wiſh for peace; and even went ſo far, as to upbraid the French miniſtry with having led his ſubjects into an expenſive and unneceſſary war. The king of Portugal was made choice of to act as a mediator between Great-Britain and Spain; but the negotiation was rendered abortive, by the artful intrigues of the French, and the unrelenting diſpoſition of the Spaniſh queen-dowager. Such was the ſtate of public affairs at the end of this year. In Italy, the Auſtrians had been ſucceſsful, but their provinces in the Netherlands were in the hands of the French. The allies could only act on the defenſive, while Holland was every moment in danger of being totally ſubdued.

A. D. 1747. The French reſolved, early in the beginning of this year, to make the moſt powerful efforts; and, for that purpoſe, Lewis XV. propoſed opening the campaign at the head of an army conſiſting of one hundred and fifty thouſand men; while ſixty thouſand were ſent into Provence, to aſſiſt the Spaniards, and enable them once more to diſtreſs the Auſtrians and the king of Sardinia.

The duke of Cumberland having reſtored peace at home, by ſubduing the rebels, went over to Flanders, and in the month of February marched the allied army, in three diviſions, to the banks of the Maeſe, amounting in the whole to one hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand men. Marſhal Saxe, whoſe army lay in quarters of cantonment along the Schelde, from Bruſſels to Antwerp, formed a reſolution of making himſelf maſter of Holland: and having tranſmitted an account of his deſign to the French court, it was approved of by a great majority, and orders were ſent him to begin the operations as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit. Accordingly count Lowendahl attacked Sluys with an army of twenty-ſeven thouſand men, and in a few days the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender. Many other places ſurrendered almoſt as ſoon as attacked; for the Dutch, during the greateſt part of this war, behaved in the moſt cowardly and infamous manner. Hulſt, in particular, a place of great importance, was ſurrendered up by the Dutch governor, although he knew that the duke of Cumberland was within a day's march to aſſiſt him. In a few weeks, count Lowendahl ſubdued every place in Dutch Flanders; upon which the people of Holland roſe in a moſt tumultuous manner, and inſiſted that the prince of Orange ſhould be made choice of as ſtadtholder, and intruſted with the executive authority. It was in vain to oppoſe the popular clamour; and the ſtates of Zealand having made choice of the prince to be their captain-general and admiral, their example was followed by the reſt of the provinces, which gave the utmoſt ſatisfaction to the people.

Things now began to wear a different aſpect; for a treaty had been concluded between Great-Britain and the empreſs of Ruſſia, by which the latter was to furniſh fifty thouſand men, to act in ſuch manner as his Britannic majeſty ſhould think proper. The Dutch, who had hitherto acted in the moſt dilatory manner, promiſed to exert themſelves, on condition that the Britiſh parliament ſhould be diſſolved; a propoſal which his majeſty complied with, although they had not ſat ſix years. Accordingly, on the eighteenth of June, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being preſent, he told them, that although he found himſelf under the neceſſity of diſſolving them, yet it was not from any motives of diſguſt, but to comply with the requeſts of his allies. He thanked them for the generous manner in which they had contributed towards the expence of the war; and then the parliament was diſſolved, after having paſſed the famous act for aboliſhing hereditary juriſdictions in Scotland, which, in all probability, will prevent a rebellion from ever breaking out again in that part of the kingdom.

The duke of Cumberland, who had been obliged to remain ſome time inactive, drew in his ſcattered parties on the twentieth of July, and formed, for an engagement with the French, at a village called Vall, or La Vall, near the town of Maeſtricht. The French were ſtrongly poſted on the riſing ground, in ſight of the allies, and both armies continued to cannonade each other till the evening. Next morning, by day-break, marſhal Saxe ordered the French infantry to march down upon the allies, which they did in a vaſt column of ten battalions in front, and as many in depth, and attacked the village of La Vall with amazing fury. This was one of the boldeſt attempts that could have been made; for the allies had planted batteries of cannon in all the avenues leading to the village, which did prodigious execution among the enemy, and the village was four times taken and retaken. At laſt numbers prevailed, and the allies were obliged to give up the village.

In the mean time, the duke of Cumberland ordered the Britiſh and Hanoverian forces to advance on the right of the enemy; and he had taken his meaſures ſo prudently, that victory would have declared in favour of the allies, had it not been for the cowardly behaviour of the Dutch. The Britiſh and Hanoverian foot advanced with ſuch bravery, that the French had almoſt given way, and the duke ordered the Dutch cavalry to ſupport them; but, inſtead of obeying the orders, they wheeled to the right, and trod down five battalions of the allied army. The French general, taking the advantage of this unexpected circumſtance, ordered his cavalry to advance, which they did, and broke through the lines of the Engliſh. In vain did the duke of Cumberland attempt to rally the Dutch forces; and had it not been for the moſt exemplary behaviour and bravery of Sir John Ligonier, the allied army would have been totally defeated. That brave general, putting himſelf at the head of a large body of cavalry, attacked the French with ſuch fury, that he checked their progreſs, and, in conſequence thereof, enabled the duke to retreat in very good order. Sir John having, by his gallant behaviour, thus ſaved the army, was the laſt man that offered to retreat, and then he was taken priſoner, along with the Hanoverian general d'Yſſembourg, general Bland, colonel Conway, and lord Robert Sutton. The loſs, in killed and wounded, fell almoſt wholly on the Engliſh, Hanoverians and Heſſians; for few of the Auſtrians engaged; and the Dutch, inſtead of having done their duty, contributed, in a great meaſure, towards the loſs of the battle. This victory coſt the French ten thouſand of their beſt troops; nor was it attended with any great advantages, for the duke ordered the garriſon of Maeſtricht to be reinforced with ſeveral battalions, and eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Heer in the dutchy of Limberg.

The country laying open before them, the French reſolved to attack Bergen-op-zoom, the ſtrongeſt fort belonging to the Dutch, and ſituated in ſuch a man- that it could not be blocked up by ſea. It had been hitherto conſidered as impregnable; for altho' often beſieged by great armies, yet had never been taken. The command of the ſiege was given to the count Lowendahl, one of the greateſt generals in Europe; while the fortreſs, one of the moſt important that the Dutch had to loſe, was left to the care of baron Cronſtram, an old ſuperannuated general, deſtitute of courage, and utterly unacquainted with the art of war. It was imagined by moſt people, that the French would never be able to take the place; but the activity of count Lowendahl overcame every difficulty; and after two months ſiege a breach was made, and the French battalions entered the place; while the old governor, who ought to have been every where to ſuperintend the works, was ſleeping in his quarters.

The whole of the garriſon would have been made priſoners of war, had it not been for the bravery of a regiment of Scotch highlanders, under the command of lord John Murray, who fought like lions, and three-fourths of them were left dead on the ſpot. The French king created count Lowendahl a marſhal of France, the higheſt dignity he could raiſe him to; and Bergen-op-zoom being in the power of the enemy, the two armies went into winter quarters, while the duke of Cumberland returned to London.

With reſpect to the affairs of Italy, the war was carried on there with great vigour. The marſhal de Belliſle, who had been releaſed from impriſonment, was ſent to command the French army in Provence; but notwithſtanding he attempted to penetrate into Piedmonteſe, yet he met with ſuch oppoſition from the count de Briqueras, that after an engagement that laſted near a whole day, the French were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of near five thouſand men.

Money, with arms and ammunition, had been remitted to the republic of Genoa from the French, ſo that they had been enabled to defend their own territories; but Lewis XV. who had been ſo ſucceſsful in Flanders, ſaw all his Italian projects baffled, and his forces obliged to return to Provence.

With reſpect to naval affairs, they were very favourable to Britain during this year; for the French, having ordered a fleet to be fitted out in order to recover Cape Breton, the Engliſh admirals, Anſon and Warren, were ſent to oppoſe them with a ſtrong fleet of ſhips of the line. Accordingly on the third of May, a moſt bloody engagement happened near Cape Finiſterre, in which the French were defeated with conſiderable loſs, and all their deſigns of relieving their colonies were rendered abortive. Mr. Anſon and Mr. Warren, upon their return home, were both rewarded with marks of the royal favour; the firſt being created a peer of England, and the other with a red ribbon of the Bath.

Captain Fox, who commanded the Kent, fell in with a fleet of French merchantmen from St. Dominica, near the coaſt of Galicia, and took twenty-ſix of them richly laden; by which our brave ſeamen were, in part, rewarded handſomely for the hardſhips they had ſuffered. But this was not all the loſs that the French ſuffered at ſea; for, towards the latter end of October, admiral Hawke was diſpatched to intercept their Weſt India fleet, and fell in with them near Belliſle. A moſt deſperate engagement enſued, in which the French were utterly defeated, and ſix ſhips, with three thouſand priſoners were brought into the harbour of Portſmouth. All theſe loſſes tended towards diſcouraging the French; for although their conqueſts in the Netherlands had been very rapid, yet their nation was drained both of men and money; while their commerce was deſtroyed, and their ſubjects ſtarving: from which circumſtance we may learn, the importance a good navy is of to Britain.

With reſpect to the queen of Hungary, the king of Spain, and others of the allies, they were all heartily tired of the war; and Britain, though at more expence than all the others put together, ſeemed reſolved not to ſheath the ſword till juſtice was done, that peace might be concluded upon honourable and advantageous terms. The French king had intimated to Sir John Ligonier, that he was deſirous of peace; and, in conſequence thereof, towards the latter end of this year, friendly meſſages paſſed between all the contending parties.

The election for members to ſerve in the new parliament had been carried on every where in favour of the court, and both houſes met on the tenth of November, when his majeſty took notice of the happineſs that would ariſe to the proteſtant intereſt, by the change of government that had taken place in the United Provinces; and he congratulated them on the vaſt ſucceſs of the Britiſh navy, by which it was probable peace would ſoon be eſtabliſhed.

The firſt thing done by the miniſtry, was to bring in a bill for the general naturalization of foreign proteſtants; but the city of London remonſtrated ſo ſtrongly againſt it, that it was thought moſt prudent to drop the bill.

A. D. 1748. The committee of ways and means propoſed giving nine millions for the expences of the year; and it being approved of by the commons, was unanimouſly granted, partly by a land-tax, and partly by a loan on the credit of the exchequer. In March a congreſs was opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinſon on the part of the Engliſh; count de St. Severin for the French; and for the ſtates-general baron de Waſſenaer and mynheer Haſſelaer. On the thirteenth of May the king prorogued the parliament, after having informed them, that preliminaries for a general peace had been ſigned, and then ſet out for Holland, where he had a conference with the prince of Orange before he proceeded to Hanover.

On the third day of May, marſhal Saxe entered the town of Maeſtricht, which had been ſurrendered upon condition, that it ſhould be delivered up without any damage being done to the ſtores and magazines, if a ceſſation of arms then took place, in order to make room for a general pacification. To the deputies already mentioned were added the following, viz. the marquis de la Porthune Thueil, on the part of France; for Spain the marquis de Soto Major; for the houſe of Auſtria, count de Raunitz; for the king of Sardinia, Don Joſeph Oſſorio, and the count de Chavennes; for the republic of Genoa, the marquis Dorio; count de Monzone, for the duke of Modena; and for the Dutch, the count Bentinck. During the conferences between theſe plenipotentiaries, many difficulties were ſtarted that could not be adjuſted till the return of expreſſes from their different ſovereigns; and, after ſeveral months ſpent in daily conferences, peace was concluded upon terms to the following purport:

On the ſeventh day of October all priſoners, who had been taken during the war, were to be releaſed, and the conqueſts returned to their former owners. Don Philip was to have Parma and Placentia in Italy; but if he ſhould either aſſume the throne of Spain or Naples, or die without male iſſue, theſe provinces were to be given up to the houſe of Auſtria. Great Britain was to ſend two perſons of high rank as hoſtages to remain in Paris, till ſuch places had been given up as had been conquered by us from the French; and accordingly the earl of Suffolk and lord Cathcart were ſent; but this meaſure gave great diſpleaſure to the people in general, becauſe they looked upon it as diſhonourable, and to all intents and purpoſes a diſgrace to the nation. Dunkirk was to remain fortified on the land ſide, but all the works adjoining to the ſea were to be deſtroyed, and the harbour laid open. The king of Pruſſia was to enjoy peaceable poſſeſſion of the province of Sileſia, and the queen of Hungary was to remain ſovereign of all the hereditary dominions left her by her father the emperor Charles VI. and which had for many years belonged to her family.

The Spaniards were to have leave, for four years, to purchaſe ſlaves on the coaſt of Guinea; a privilege that they had been long deprived of: and with reſpect to the other parts and articles of this treaty, they were rather of a formal than an important nature.

Such were the principal parts of this treaty, and few are to be met with in hiſtory that ever gave greater offence to the people in general. Great ſums of money had been granted by the Britiſh parliament, the ſubjects had been loaded with heavy taxes, and they had paid them in order to ſupport the honour of the nation; but here, in conſequence of this treaty, they found that their treaſure had been laviſhed away, and the flower of their army deſtroyed, for no other purpoſe than that of ſupporting German princes, and protecting the electorate of Hanover. They complained that their plenipotentiaries had deceived them, and concluded the articles of peace before they had been duely conſidered by the people; and nothing but murmurs were to be heard from the one end of the kingdom to the other.

His Britannic majeſty, who had been, during the ſummer, on a viſit to his electoral dominions, where he eſtabliſhed the famous univerſity of Gottingen, returned to England in the latter end of October; and on the twenty-ninth of November both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter. His majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had taken the moſt effectual methods to promote the intereſt of his people, conſiſtent with the ſtate of public affairs; and that as moſt of the contending parties ſeemed averſe to carrying on the war any longer, ſo he doubted not but peace would now be eſtabliſhed on the moſt ſolid and laſting foundation. He added, that now the war was over, the public expence would be much leſſened; and therefore, all he deſired of them was, that they would grant ſuch ſupplies as ſhould, from a proper eſtimate, appear neceſſary to ſupport the dignity of the crown, by enabling him to fulfil thoſe engagements, which, in conſequence of the late treaty of peace he had entered into.

In anſwer to this ſpeech both houſes preſented very loyal and affectionate addreſſes, though not without ſome oppoſition from the commons. Some of the members in the oppoſition condemned the conduct of the miniſtry in giving plenary powers to the deputies to conclude a peace before the arrival of thirty-ſeven thouſand Ruſſians, who were on their march to join the allied army. They inſiſted, that an enquiry ſhould be ſet on foot to make thoſe at the helm of public affairs, give an account in what manner the public money had been ſo laviſhly ſquandered away; but the power of the miniſterial party bore down all oppoſition.

The conduct of Mr. Pelham, brother to the duke of Newcaſtle, was ſeverely cenſured; but Mr. Pitt, ſince earl of Chatham, and Mr. Murray, now lord Mansfield, ſpoke ſo forcibly in his favour, that eight millions were granted for the ſervice of the current year; a moſt amazing ſum, when we conſider that the war was over; but a proof of the intenſe riches of the nation, and the obligations that Britiſh ſovereigns are under, to live on good terms with their ſubjects.

BOOK XV.

From the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle to the death of George II.

A. D. 1749. IN conſequence of the late treaty, the French were put in peaceable poſſeſſion of Cape Breton; and the miniſtry reſolved to cultivate the province of Nova Scotia, in the northern part of America. This ſcheme was chiefly promoted and encouraged by the earl of Hallifax, firſt lord of trade and plantations; and his majeſty, ever attentive to the welfare of his ſubjects, countenanced it with his royal approbation. Accordingly, many artificers and huſbandmen were ſent thither in order to clear the grounds, and make way for a proper ſettlement; and it muſt be acknowledged that the Britiſh nation left nothing undone in order to promote ſo patriotic a ſcheme. A town was built by the mere force of induſtry, which is now a flouriſhing port, and named Hallifax, from the title of the peer, who firſt projected it. Many people have ſettled in its neighbourhood, and, upon the whole, it may be looked upon as one of the moſt valuable acquiſitions to Great Britain.

The remainder of the tranſactions during this year, were not of a very important nature. Some domeſtic diſturbances happened in conſequence of the late peace; for many of the ſoldiers and ſeamen having been diſcharged, and not knowing in what manner to procure a ſubſiſtence, committed ſtreet robberies, for which many of them were executed.

The parliament met on the ſixteenth of November, and the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that it was with the utmoſt pleaſure he could now behold peace in Europe, by which the public credit was again re-eſtabliſhed, and commerce, the ſupport of the nation, was likely to flouriſh. To this ſpeech both houſes returned the moſt loyal and affectionate addreſſes, after which they entered upon public buſineſs, and granted his majeſty ſuch a ſupply, as was able to defray all the expences of government. Some of the ſtudents of Oxford having been guilty of uttering expreſſions of a treaſonable nature, were tried in the court of King's-bench, and two of them were obliged to walk with papers on their breaſts through Weſtminſter-hall.

A. D. 1750. One thing of great importance that engaged the attention of this parliament was the herring fiſhery; and a bill being brought in for that purpoſe, it paſſed into a law, and a ſociety was formed for carrying it into execution, at the head of which was his royal highneſs Frederick, prince of Wales. Another act paſſed this ſeſſion for encouragement of Weavers in the ſail-cloth trade, an article of the utmoſt importance to the Britiſh nation. Upon the whole, few ſeſſions ever paſſed more acts for the general encouragement of commerce and manufactures; but indeed nothing could be more neceſſary, as the nation had been almoſt ruined by an expenſive and deſtructive war.

On the twelfth of April the king went, in the uſual manner, to the houſe of peers, where, in a ſpeech from the throne, he thanked the commons for that attention which they had paid to the intereſts of the nation, and for the ſupplies granted to ſupport the government.

Some things of a domeſtic nature took place this year, which muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence. On the eighth of February, a ſhock of an earthquake was felt in London, by which ſome chimnies were thrown down, and the Thames was very much agitated. The conſternation of the people on this occaſion is even beyond deſcription. But what was ſtill more, on the eighth of March, about half paſt five in the morning, ſuch a violent ſhock was felt, that many of the people ran from their beds naked, being afraid that their houſes would tumble upon them. This ſhock was not confined to London, for it was felt in ſome other parts, particularly in Eſſex, Kent, and Surrey: and a wild enthuſiaſtic, driven mad by zeal, foretold, that on the eighth of April, a third ſhock of an earthquake would lay all London in ruins. One would have thought that ſuch a prediction would have been treated with the utmoſt contempt; eſpecially, as it is declared in Holy writ, that ſuch things are known to God only; but notwithſtanding, ſo infatuated were thouſands of people, that they actually believed the impoſter, and waited for the accompliſhment of his prediction, as if he had been a meſſenger ſent from heaven.

The goal diſtemper, which, in its conſequences, generally proves as fatal as the plague, broke out during the ſeſſion at the Old Bailey, in the month of April this year. Sir Samuel Pennant, lord-mayor of London, Sir Daniel Lambert, one of the aldermen, Sir Thomas Abney, one of the judges of the court of Common-Pleas, baron Clarke of the exchequer, ſeven gentlemen of the law, ſeveral of the jury, beſides a great number of thoſe who were preſent to hear the trials loſt their lives. Indeed it cannot be aſcertained how many perſons died; but certain it is, that the city was greatly alarmed, and every one was afraid of the infection.

During the ſummer of this year his majeſty went to viſit his electoral dominions, and during his reſidence there, he ſigned a treaty with the emperor of Morocco; by which, all the Britiſh captives in his dominions were ſet at liberty. Few other things worth notice happened this year either at home or abroad; for the people were enjoying the ſweets of peace after the toils of war.

The prince and princeſs of Wales, with their eldeſt daughter the princeſs Auguſta, during this ſummer, went on a tour to the weſt and ſouth of England; where they were received, and treated with that reſpect due to their high ſtation and amiable characters.

While his majeſty was abroad, he endeavoured to get the archduke Joſeph, ſon of the emperor, elected king of the Romans; but the ſcheme met with ſuch oppoſition, that for the preſent it was obliged to be laid aſide.

A. D. 1751. On the ſeventeenth of January, the parliament met, and the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had concluded two treaties, one with the king of Spain, and the other with ſome of the German princes, the contents of which ſhould be laid before them. He recommended to both houſes unanimity in their councils: and concluded, by deſiring them not to forget the ſtate of the nation, but above all things provide for its internal ſafety. To this ſpeech loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, and received by his majeſty in the moſt gracious manner.

The firſt thing that engaged the attention of the commons, was a violent diſpute between lord Trentham, and Sir George Vandeput, relating to a ſeat in parliament. Lord Trentham having accepted the place of a lord of the admiralty, his ſeat became vacant, and a writ was iſſued for the election of a new member to repreſent the city of Weſtminſter.

Lord Trentham was ſupported by the miniſtry, who looked upon Sir George Vandeput as one ſet up by the popular party. A poll being demanded and taken, the high-bailiff declared the majority to be in favour of lord Trentham; but that not being ſatisfactory to the oppoſite party, they proceeded to a ſcrutiny. Still the majority ſeemed to be in favour of lord Trentham, and the high-bailiff returned him duly elected; upon which he took the oaths and his ſeat in the houſe. At this meaſure, the friends of Sir George were ſo much enraged, that they preſented a petition to the houſe, complaining of the conduct of the high-bailiff; to which lord Trentham preſented an anſwer; ſetting forth, that the friends of Sir George had, in the whole of their conduct, acted utterly inconſiſtent with the conſtitution, and inſtead of ſupporting the freedom of election, had intimidated all thoſe who came to poll, unleſs they happened to be of their own party; and that they had gone ſo far as to threaten the high-bailiff.

That a proper enquiry might be made into theſe allegations, the high-bailiff was ſummoned to the bar of the houſe, where he gave information, that the honourable Mr. Murray, brother to the lord Elibank, Mr. Crowle, a counſellor at law, and one Gibſon, an upholder, had obſtructed him in the diſcharge of his duty. Crowle was obliged to kneel down at the bar of the houſe, and receive a reprimand on his knees from the ſpeaker; and Gibſon was committed to Newgate. With reſpect to Mr. Murray, the charge againſt him was very heavy; for it appeared, from undoubted evidence, that he had raiſed a moſt outrageous mob, and called out to them to knock the dog on the head; by which he meant the high-bailiff.

Accordingly he was committed a cloſe priſoner to Newgate, and then brought to the bar of the houſe to receive judgment; but when he came, he refuſed to kneel; at which the houſe was ſo much enraged, that he was recommitted to the ſame priſon, and forbid the uſe of pens, ink, or paper, nor was any one permitted to converſe with him, unleſs they firſt received an order from the ſpeaker. In that manner he remained in priſon till the end of the ſeſſion, and the power of parliament being then diſſolved, he was ſet at liberty amidſt the acclamations of the people.

During this ſeſſion of parliament his royal highneſs Frederick, prince of Wales, was ſeized with a fever, which put an end to his valuable life, on the twentieth day of March, in the forty-fifth year of his age. His royal highneſs left, beſides his preſent majeſty, four ſons and three daughters, and ſoon after his death was born the princeſs Carolina Matilda, now queen of Denmark. The day after the prince's death his body was opened, and it was found that there was an abſceſs upon his lungs, which had burſt and occaſioned his death. His remains were depoſited in the chapel of Henry VII. the duke of Somerſet walking as chief mourner, attended by ſeveral other noblemen.

With reſpect to the character of this prince, we muſt conſider it both in a public and private light. In public, he ſeemed to have nothing ſo much at heart as the good of the people; and he often attended the debates in the houſe of peers, in order to acquire a perfect knowledge of the conſtitution. The people in general had formed the moſt ſanguine hopes, that one day they would be happy under his government; and there is great reaſon to believe, that had he aſcended the throne, he would have cultivated the arts of peace in a manner ſuperior to all thoſe who had gone before him. In his private life, he was an affectionate huſband, a tender parent, an indulgent maſter, and a ſincere friend. All the time he could ſpare from public buſineſs, was ſpent in ſuperintending the education of his children; ſo that it may juſtly be ſaid of him, "He joined in one, "the prince, the father, the huſband, and the "friend." But all the hopes of the public were blaſted, and ſunk in the nature of all ſublunary things.

The death of the prince, for ſome time, put an end to party diſputes; and his eldeſt ſon, our preſent ſovereign, was created prince of Wales; while the princeſs-dowager of Wales, his mother, was to act as regent in his ſtead, if his majeſty ſhould happen to die before he arrived at years of maturity.

On the twenty-ſecond day of May, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave his royal aſſent to the bill for aboliſhing the OLD, and eſtabliſhing the NEW ſtile; which has been attended with the moſt beneficial conſequences to the merchants in general, who, before that time, were often led into confuſion concerning the dates of their bills and letters. On the twenty-fifth of June, his majeſty prorogued the parliament; and, in his ſpeech, informed them, that as a general diſſoluteneſs of manners had taken place among the people, it was their duty to do all in their power to enforce the execution of thoſe laws which had been made againſt immorality and profaneneſs.

On the eleventh of October, this year, the prince of Orange died, in the forty-firſt year of his age; and that event was ſucceeded by the death of the queen of Denmark, youngeſt daughter of his majeſty, who expired on the nineteenth of December.

With reſpect to the affairs on the continent, the French ſeemed intent on proſecuting their deſign of enlarging their conqueſts in North-America, and in ſpiriting up the Indians to murder our traders on the borders of Virginia. Spain was intent on putting their navy on a proper footing; and, for that purpoſe, ſeveral of the men who, in conſequence of the peace, had been diſcharged from our dock-yards, were inveigled over to that country, where they built ſeveral ſhips of war, on the ſame model as the Engliſh. Nothing could be more inconſiſtent with ſound policy, than to ſuffer thoſe uſeful men to leave the kingdom; and it was the duty of the miniſtry, when they diſcharged them, to provide for them ſome other employments, inſtead of leaving them to ſtarve.

On the fourteenth day of November, the parliament met; and the king, in a ſpeech from the throne, informed them, that he had concluded a treaty with the king of Poland, who was now become his moſt faithful ally; and that, with reſpect to the death of the prince of Orange, it would make no alteration in the ſtate of public affairs. He told them, that the ſtates-general were firm in the intereſt of Great-Britain: and concluded by recommending to their notice the ſhocking condition in which the nation was involved by a ſpirit of licentiouſneſs that ſeemed to have diffuſed itſelf through all ranks of people; ſo that nothing but the groſſeſt immorality and profaneneſs were to be met with. Both houſes preſented loyal and affectionate addreſſes to his majeſty; and Mr. Muncy, who had given ſo much diſturbance during the former ſeſſions, made his eſcape out of the kingdom; while the publiſher of a pamphlet, intituled his caſe, was proſecuted at common law, and, after a long hearing, was moſt honourably acquitted by the jury.

A. D. 1752. The commons having granted the neceſſary ſupplies, amounting in the whole to four millions, other buſineſs of a very important nature was entered upon, and many uſeful acts paſſed for the regulation of the internal policy of the nation. One act was made to puniſh ſuch as kept diſorderly houſes; and another, by which all pawnbrokers were obliged to take out licences: that the people in the highlands might be brought under a proper ſubjection to the government, ſome of the forfeited eſtates were reduced into one conſolidated fund, and the profits ariſing from them appropriated towards erecting charity-ſchools, that the children of thoſe concerned in the rebellion might be brought up in the principles of the proteſtant religion. Working-ſchools were at the ſame time eſtabliſhed, by which many poor children were uſefully employed; and poſterity will have reaſon to bleſs thoſe who firſt propoſed making an act that will, in the end, be attended with the moſt beneficial conſequences.

Another act paſſed during this ſeſſion of parliament, for preventing the horrid crime of murder: wherein it was ordained, that every criminal convicted of having wilfully, and of malice, killed another, ſhould be executed on the next day except one after the ſentence was pronounced: but if it ſhould happen that judgment was pronounced on Friday, then execution was not to take place till Monday, becauſe of the Sunday intervening. The body of the malefactor was to be either delivered to the ſurgeons, to be diſſected and anatomized, or it was to be hung in chains on a gibbet; but it was not, on any account whatever, to be buried. The commons paſſed a reſolution, that, for the future, all their daily journals ſhould be annually publiſhed, and the care of the publication was left to Mr. Hardinge, the chief clerk, which gave great ſatisfaction to the ſubjects in general: and on the twenty-ſixth day of March, the king went to Weſtminſter, and prorogued both houſes of parliament.

Moſt of the powers of Europe were, during this year, very buſy in promoting ſuch ſchemes as ſeemed conſiſtent either with their intereſt or ambition. Some trifling diſputes aroſe between the king of Pruſſia and the court of Great-Britain, but theſe were adjuſted in the moſt amicable manner. In Corſica, nothing was to be ſeen but diſorders of the worſt ſort; for the Genoeſe, who pretended to the right of ſovereignty over that iſland, had impoſed ſuch grievous taxes on the people, that they became mad by oppreſſion. In Germany, a ſecond attempt was made to elect the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans; but it was ſo violently oppoſed by the king of Pruſſia, that the whole dropped for the preſent, contrary to the inclination of his Britannic majeſty, who had exerted himſelf very much on the occaſion. In America, the French were carrying on their plots in ſuch a barefaced manner, that it was not conſiſtent with the honour or intereſt of Britain to remain an idle ſpectator. Nor were the French leſs aſſiduous in executing their projects in the Eaſt-Indies, where they ſpirited up the natives to make incurſions into our ſettlements, by which many of our traders were much injured. In the Weſt-Indies, the ſame ſchemes were carried on; ſo that the people of this country began to ſee that the French had only made peace in order to declare war as ſoon as they could, conſiſtent with the nature of their circumſtances.

On the fifteenth of September this year, a moſt dreadful hurricane happened in South-Carolina, by which many of the inhabitants were killed, and ſeveral houſes in Charles-Town deſtroyed. This reduced the people to great diſtreſs; but the generoſity of the inhabitants of Great-Britain was ſo warm in their favour, that all their loſſes were made up, and the colony left in a more flouriſhing condition than ever. Nothing more of any importance happened this year; for, during the greateſt part of the ſummer, his Britannic majeſty had been at Hanover.

A.D. 1753. The public buſineſs during this year was, for the moſt part, of a parliamentary nature. The ſeſſions was opened on the eleventh of Jannary, and both houſes preſented very loyal addreſſes to his majeſty. Two millions were granted for the ſervice of the current year; and, upon the moſt ſtrict enquiry, it appeared that the national debt amounted to the enormous ſum of ſeventy-four millions, three hundred and ſixty-eight thouſand, four hundred and fifty-one pounds fifteen ſhillings. Several excellent acts paſſed during this ſeſſion, particularly one for bringing to juſtice all thoſe concerned in plundering ſuch ſhips as ſhould happen, by ſtreſs of weather, to be driven on the Engliſh coaſt. The inhabitants reſiding near the ſea, particularly in Cornwall, had been long guilty of that infamous practice; and thoſe, who ought to have been conſidered as objects of compaſſion, were robbed, and ſtripped naked.

But that which principally attracted the notice both of the public and the legiſlature, was a bill brought in for the general naturalization of the Jews. It was much countenanced by the miniſtry, and all the towns where manufactures are carried on in an extenſive manner: and having originated in the houſe of lords, it paſſed with very little oppoſition. No ſooner was it known that the bill had paſſed the upper houſe, than the nation ſeemed in one continued ſcene of clamour and oppoſition. It was repreſented as an attempt to undermine the chriſtian religion, and ſet aſide the order of God. The lord-mayor of London, with the aldermen and common-council, preſented petitions againſt it, and ſo did the merchants; but notwithſtanding, it paſſed the lower houſe by a great majority. It is not conſiſtent with the dignity of hiſtory to intermeddle with political diſputes any farther than to relate the circumſtances that gave riſe to them. Thoſe who ſupported this bill thought that great riches would be brought into the nation; and that the Jews, by buying up the goods manufactured by our artificers, would extend our commerce throughout the world. On the other hand, the popular party ſaid, that the Jews had been fugitives and vagabonds ever ſince the reign of the emperor Veſpaſian; that it was the order of God they ſhould be ſo for rejecting the Meſſiah, and the terms of ſalvation offered in the goſpel. They added farther, that they were to continue ſo till they acknowledged the Lord of glory, and therefore it was the higheſt preſumption in us to grant them any indulgence. Indeed, the legiſlative power, as well as the miniſtry, were ſenſible of this; for next ſeſſion the act was repealed, and the people, in conſequence thereof, looked upon themſelves as releaſed from a ſtate of bondage.

The next bill in which the whole nation looked upon itſelf as concerned, was that to prevent clandeſtine marriages. It is certain, that every man and woman, at a proper age, have a right to enter into the marriage ſtate, conſiſtent with their own inclinations: but in all civil ſocieties, it has been found neceſſary to lay ſuch reſtrictions on this inſtitution, as may prevent its being abuſed. Thus, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that every man who enters into the marriage ſtate, is not only capable, but alſo under an obligation, to provide, in a proper manner, conſiſtent with his circumſtances, for his wife and children. It is a duty he owes to the community; and therefore thoſe not qualified for ſuch an important truſt, will be ready to leave their wives to ſtarve, while the education of their innocent children will be neglected. Marriages, too often contracted in private, and to anſwer ſiniſter purpoſes, left no room for a public proof, if any diſpute aroſe concerning them; and many innocent children, in conſequence thereof, had been ruined. It may farther be added, that in many ſocieties it is found neceſſary to make natural rights give way to ſome political inſtitutions, which may be only of a temporary nature.

On the other hand, it was argued by thoſe who oppoſed the bill, that all mankind are, by nature, free; and that nothing can conſtitute a real marriage beyond the conſent of the parties: that all agreements, even of the moſt trifling nature, were founded on conſent; and if ſo, then marriage, the cement and ſupport of human ſociety, ought to reſt upon the ſame principle: that thoſe who did not enter into the marriage ſtate by voluntary conſent, could never take that care of their tender and helpleſs offſpring, which, by all the laws of ſociety, was incumbent upon them.

It is neceſſary to obſerve, that neither the miniſtry nor the oppoſition could be charged with this bill: it did not originate from either in particular, but from a combination of both. In a word, the reaſon for bringing in the bill was that of young heirs and heireſſes having inadvertently placed their affections on others below their ſtation, by which they were often reduced to ruin. It is extremely natural for men who have procured titles, and acquired riches, to endeavour to preſerve the one untainted, and the other undiminiſhed; and the warmer paſſions becoming extinct in the mind, a ſort of nominal prudence takes place that can never be agreeable to youth. Such were the reaſons aſſigned, or rather made uſe of, in framing this bill; and it not only paſſed both houſes by a great majority, but alſo became a law, in conſequence of the royal aſſent. It is certain, that it has both its advantages and diſadvantages, but the end deſigned by it has not taken place. No proviſion is made in the act againſt foreign marriages; and therefore nothing is more common than to hear of minors going over to the continent, to indulge their inclinations; nor has Scotland, where the proteſtant religion is profeſſed, been ſo much as mentioned. The act, like all others of a public nature, occaſioned much ſpeculation, and was either approved of or condemned according to the different ſentiments of the people. It is certain, that it might have been framed in a much better manner; but, upon the whole, we may ſee that nothing is more difficult than the reducing of natural principles to civil inſtitutions, founded upon the caprice of men who, in general, are guided by their paſſions, inſtead of reaſon.

This year was remarkable for an inſtitution which had been long wanting in Britain, and of the utmoſt importance to the republic of letters. The vaſt collection of natural curioſities belonging to Sir Hans Sloane, were purchaſed by the government, and depoſited in the noble ſtructure called Montague Houſe, in Great Ruſſell-ſtreet, near Bloomſbury. But, that the honour of the nation might be fully eſtabliſhed, and a place opened for men of learning to ſtudy, without being at any expence, the collection of manuſcripts belonging to the earl of Oxford were likewiſe purchaſed; and theſe, with the king's library, and the valuable collection made by Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton, were brought to the ſame place, which is now called the Britiſh Muſeum, and is open for the reception and uſe of the public in general. Nothing could have done greater honour to the nation than this inſtance of their good ſenſe and unbounded liberality. The moſt curious records in the nation, and copies of ſuch books as are not to be found any where elſe, are now left free for the inſpection of every one. The great officers of ſtate, amounting to twenty-one in number, are appointed official governors of this royal foundation. Two are appointed by the Oxford family, two by the deſcendants of Sir Hans Sloane, and the ſame number by thoſe who are heirs to Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton. Theſe, amounting to twenty-ſeven in number, are to chuſe fifteen more, ſo as to make the whole body of governors forty-two. But although their number is ſo large, yet no perſon can be preſented to an office in the houſe, but by an order ſigned by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, and the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

The parliament continued ſitting till the ſeventeenth of June, when his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and informed them, that nothing had happened, ſo far as he had been able to procure intelligence, that could in the leaſt diſturb the public peace: and then both houſes were prorogued.

With reſpect to foreign affairs, the French were every where buſy in preparing to break through the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, as ſoon as an opportunity ſhould offer. They had been ſpiriting up ſome of the nabobs, or ſubordinate princes in the Eaſt-Indies, to take up arms againſt the Engliſh: and although many of their attempts had been rendered abortive, yet they did not deſiſt from them; ſo that at laſt, as will appear in the ſequel, it became a national concern. It was much the ſame in America, where they had inſtigated the natives of Canada, and ſome other provinces, to take up arms againſt the Britiſh ſettlers in Nova Scotia, in order to reduce that province, which had been eſtabliſhed at ſo much expence, to the condition of a French colony.

On the fifteenth of November, both houſes of parliament met; and the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he was on the beſt of terms with his allies: but many of the commons were not ſatiſfied with this declaration, ſo that violent debates aroſe before an addreſs could be preſented. But ſtill the miniſtry carried their point; and ſuch bills as had paſſed having received the royal aſſent, the parliament was diſſolved, and writs iſſued for the election of a new one.

A. D. 1754. During the receſs of parliament, Mr. Pelham, brother to the duke of Newcaſtle, died, and was ſucceeded in that important office, of firſt lord of the treaſury, by his brother, at that time one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. He was a man of great abilities, beloved by the people, and honoured by his ſovereign with many marks of his royal favour. He was a real friend to the Hanover family; and, during a courſe of many years, he had ſupported the intereſts of government in the houſe of commons, without ever propoſing any thing that, in the end, could become prejudicial to the people.

Throughout the whole nation, the election for members to ſerve in parliament went in favour of the miniſtry, who had acquired ſuch an aſcendency, that every thing gave way to them. Few diſturbances happened; and the writs being returned, the duke of Cumberland, in commiſſion, with ſome other noblemen, opened the ſeſſion, Mr. Onſlow being choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. The lord-chancellor Hardwick, now raiſed to the dignity of an earl, informed the members, that his majeſty had called them together, in order to conſult on ſome things of the utmoſt importance, which would be laid before them in proper time; and doubted not but they would do every thing to ſupport the honour of the crown, and ſecure the intereſt of the nation. But nothing of any importance was done: for the parliament, which met on the tenth of May, was prorogued on the fifth of June; ſo that all buſineſs which naturally came under their conſideration was ſuſpended till the month of November following:

The depredations made by the French on the properties of our ſubjects in North-America, had occaſioned ſeveral remonſtrances to be made to the court of Verſailles; but no ſatisfactory anſwers were received, every one being evaſive and uncertain. This induced our miniſtry to ſend an expreſs order to Mr. Dinwiddie, one of the North-American governors, to drive the French out of his province, and to erect forts, to prevent their future incurſions. In conſequence of theſe orders, ſome ſkirmiſhes happened: and as it ſeemed reaſonable to believe that the French intended to commence hoſtilities, the earl of Albemarle, our ambaſſador at Paris, was ordered to remonſtrate upon it to the French miniſtry, as a breach of the faith of treaties, and inconſiſtent with the law of nations. The earl obeyed his orders; but, inſtead of receiving a ſatisfactory anſwer, the French began gradually to pull off the maſk, and new reinforcements were ſent to America, in the ſame manner as if war had been declared between both nations. From which we may learn, that no confidence is to be put in ſuch perfidious people at any time.

During this year, the queen-mother of Spain loſt all her influence at court, by the diſgrace of her favourite, the marquis de la Enſenada, who was ſucceeded by Mr. Wall, the ſon of an Iriſh papiſt, who followed the fortune of James II. at the revolution. The king of Portugal, who had received many favours from the Engliſh, began to act in the moſt ungrateful manner. He impoſed ſome ſevere taxes upon the Britiſh merchants in the factory at Liſbon, and even went ſo far as to cauſe ſome of them to be impriſoned.

In Denmark, Sweden, and Ruſſia, as well as Germany, every thing remained in a ſtate of tranquillity, although nothing had been left undone by the court of France to draw ſome of the above powers over to their meaſures. In America, the French continued to carry on their encroachments in a bolder manner than ever. Great complaints were exhibited againſt them, and the people in general wiſhed for the meeting of the parliament, which took place on the fourteenth day of November.

His majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had done every thing to preſerve the public peace of Europe, and that no material alteration had taken place ſince their laſt ſeſſion. He recommended to them to take into their conſideration the affairs of America, but took no notice of the encroachments made by the French on our ſettlements. This was conſidered, by the more diſcerning of the people, as one of the greateſt maſter-ſtrokes of policy; for the minority in the houſe were gaining ground; and it was expected, had his majeſty diſcovered the real ſtate of American affairs, violent oppoſition would have been made to the addreſs, which is always expected at the beginning of each ſeſſion.

The addreſs being preſented, the commons voted that the ſum of four millions, ſeventy-three thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-ſeven pounds, ſhould be granted for the ſervice of the current year. Subſidies were alſo granted to ſeveral foreign princes, particularly the elector of Bavaria, who was to have a body of forces ready, in caſe his majeſty's dominions in Germany ſhould be attacked by the French, or any other of the European powers. Theſe vigorous reſolutions of the houſe of commons alarmed the French to the higheſt degree; but as they had all along acted in the moſt inſincere manner, ſo, on the preſent occaſion, they directed their ambaſſador, the duke de Mirepoix, to amuſe our miniſtry with pretences, that they had not the moſt diſtant view of diſturbing ſuch of our ſubjects as were ſettled in America. Theſe declarations were, however, of too fallacious a nature to have any effect with the people of England. The eyes of our miniſtry were now opened, and nothing ſeemed ſo neceſſary as that of ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation.

A. D. 1755. A proclamation was iſſued on the twenty-third day of January, offering a bounty to ſuch ſeamen as were willing to enter into his majeſty's ſervice. Preſs-warrants were ſent to the principal ſea-port towns: all artificers in our dock-yards, as well as ſeamen, were prohibited, under ſevere penalties, from entering into foreign ſervice: and all ſuch as were abroad, were commanded to return. Things were now grown to ſuch an height, that the deſigns of the French could be no longer concealed; and therefore the king ſent a meſſage to the parliament by Sir Thomas Robinſon, informing them, that the encroachments made on our ſettlements in America rendered it neceſſary for him to augment both his navy and army, and he doubted not but his faithful ſubjects would ſtand by him with their lives and fortunes. Affectionate and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes: and although the French boaſted much of the ſuperior power of their fleets in Breſt and Toulon, yet the Britiſh ſubjects paid little regard to it. The miniſtry prohibited the Iriſh from ſupplying the French with proviſions, which was one of the beſt meaſures that could have been taken, and was applauded by the people in general.

Great diſpatch was made by our miniſtry to fit out the fleet; and, towards the latter end of April, admiral Boſcawen ſailed from Portſmouth with ten ſhips of the line, and ſix frigates, in which were ſix thouſand ſoldiers and marines. About the ſame time, ſailed from Breſt the French fleet, under the command of admiral Macnamara, an Iriſh gentleman; but he had ſecret inſtructions to diſpatch his vice-admiral in his room, while he himſelf, with five ſhips of the line, cruized near the ſtreights of Gibraltar, with no other view than to try whether he could not oblige our admiral to divide his fleet, which had been reinforced by a ſquadron under the command of admiral Holborne. Mr. Pitt, at that time ſecretary at war, procured an act which will ever do honour to his memory, namely, to advance ſix months pay to the ſeamen, and not ſuffer them to ſell their tickets to rapacious uſurers, who often bought them at the rate of fifty per cent. diſcount, to the diſhonour of the nation.

The public buſineſs being diſpatched, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers and told them, he adhered, in the moſt ſacred manner, to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; but as the French had, in the moſt bare-faced manner, broken through every article of it, he could not, conſiſtent with the honour of his crown, and the duty he owed to his people, ſuffer them to proceed any further without the moſt vigorous oppoſition. He added, that he never would declare war but upon the moſt juſtifiable terms; and concluded, by aſſuring them, that he truſted for ſucceſs in the Divine Providence, which was ever ready to aſſiſt thoſe who acted juſtly. He then prorogued the parliament, and having made choice of a proper regency to conduct the public affairs, ſet out to viſit his electoral dominions. While he was there he learned, that the French king had entered into a ſecret treaty with the court of Vienna; and to prevent any evil conſequences that might reſult therefrom, he engaged to take into his pay a large body of Heſſian troops; and, at the ſame time, concluded a treaty offenſive and defenſive, with the empreſs of Ruſſia.

While his majeſty was, in concert with his miniſtry, contriving ſuch ſchemes as were moſt likely to be of ſervice to the nation in general, the French were continuing their depredations on our ſettlements, and the inhabitants of the American colonies were quarrelling with their governors. This induced all them who wiſhed well to our intereſts in America, to look down, in the moſt unfavourable manner, on the unproſperous ſtate of the public affairs. Unanimity was wiſhed for; but few expected it. Admiral Boſcawen, who was now off Louiſbourg, attacked part of the French fleet, and actually diſperſed them, which gave ſome gleam of hope to the people of England, who promiſed themſelves great things from the ſuperior abilities of that commander. Two of the French ſhips were taken and ſent to Halifax in Nova Scotia, where they were afterwards condemned as lawful prizes.

A trifling expedition was made in the month of June this year, on the frontiers of the colony eſtabliſhed by the French in Canada; but no other conſequences reſulted from it than that of keeping up the ſpirits of the people. On the other hand, during the ſame month, general Braddock marched, at the head of two thouſand regulars, in order to attack fort Du Queſne; but met with ſo many obſtacles, that his little army was much reduced: for the coloniſts, who had long quarrelled with their governors, refuſed to ſend him ſuch waggons and proviſions as were neceſſary for his aſſiſtance. However, under all theſe difficulties, he arrived, on the eighth of July, within ten miles of fort Du Queſne; and the French, having, by their ſpies, received intelligence of all his motions, advanced to meet him, and encamped in a very advantageous ſituation. Prudence is equally neceſſary in a general as reſolution; and he ought to know when to act on the offenſive or the defenſive; but that quality was wanting in Braddock. Sir Peter Halket, the ſecond in command, adviſed him to cultivate the friendſhip of the Indians, and ſend ſome of them as an advanced guard; becauſe they were much better acquainted with the country than the regulars, who had never been in thoſe parts before. But nothing could prevail with the general, nor would he ſuffer a council of war to be held; ſo that, regardleſs of danger, he marched forward, as if he had been ſure of victory. The French, who had taken every neceſſary precaution, came out of their entrenchments to meet him; while the Indians in their intereſt, whom they had concealed in a wood, burſt out upon the Engliſh, and galled them in flank, while the regulars attacked their front. The general behaved with great courage; but after having five horſes killed under him, he received a mortal wound, of which he died. Soon after Sir Peter Halket and his ſon were both killed; and in general many of the officers ſhared the ſame fate; for the French had given orders to the Indians to aim at them, while the regulars were engaged. This was a fatal ſtroke to the Engliſh, and attended with the moſt dreadful conſequences to thoſe who lived in the back ſettlements; for the Indians in the intereſt of the French, poured upon them in great numbers, and committed the moſt horrid barbarities.

It was the general opinion, that it would be too late to take the field during the remainder of the ſeaſon; and therefore, inſtead of attacking Crown-Point, it was reſolved, that during the winter, the forces ſhould be employed in keeping up a communication between that place and Albany. General Shirley took upon him the command of one part of the troops, but his conduct was much cenſured; while that of general Johnſon, who commanded the other part, was equally applauded. The miniſtry were ſenſible of his vaſt abilities, and therefore he was created a baronet; and, at the ſame time, received a preſent of five thouſand pounds.

In Europe, the miniſters of the different courts were employed in attempting to deceive each other; while thoſe who ſpent their time in the ſtudy of politics, attempted, in vain, to diſcover their real intentions.

As the French could not, with common decency, conceal their real intentions any longer, they endeavoured to perſuade the Spaniards that it was their duty to prevent the Britiſh navy from becoming formidable in America; but Mr. Wall, their chief miniſter, was a ſincere friend to the Engliſh, and conſequently did every thing to fruſtrate the deſigns of the French. They had pretended that we were the aggreſſors in North America; and when the king of Spain offered to become a mediator between the contending parties, he was given to underſtand, that no ſuſpenſion of arms could be agreed upon as had been demanded by the French, till reparation had been made to our coloniſts for the injuries they had ſuffered. This induced the French miniſtry to intrigue with the German princes, and brought over to their intereſt the elector of Cologne, who promiſed to give them leave to form magazines in his territories. From this circumſtance, the people of England were convinced that the deſigns of the French was to attack Hanover, and for that purpoſe they entered into a confederacy with the court of Vienna, with a deſign of diſtreſſing the king of Pruſſia. Nothing was left undone by his Britannic majeſty to ſecure his electoral dominions; and for that purpoſe he formed ſeveral alliances with the German princes. A ſecond treaty was alſo entered into between our ſovereign, and the empreſs of Ruſſia; but it did not take effect. News arrived that admiral Boſcawen had obtained ſome conſiderable advantages over the French; and much about the ſame time, Sir Edward Hawke ſailed from Portſmouth with eighteen ſhips of the line, in order to intercept the French fleet; but they had the good fortune to eſcape and get ſafe into Breſt. Four men of war were diſpatched from Portſmouth, under the command of commodore Frankland, to protect our ſugar plantations from the enemy, and likewiſe to exerciſe plenary powers in committing hoſtilities wherever it ſhould ſeem neceſſary, or where he ſhould happen to meet with oppoſition.

Orders were ſent to all our naval officers to ſeize ſuch of the French ſhips as they could lay hold of; and the duke de Mirepoix, who was not able to deceive our miniſtry any longer, ſet out on his return home without taking leave.

The king, who had been in Hanover, during the greateſt part of the ſummer, returned to England on the fifteenth of September, and on the thirteenth of November, both houſes of parliament met; when the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, informed them that he had taken every neceſſary precaution to ſecure the peace of Europe, and to protect his ſubjects in America from the inſults of the French; but although he had done every thing to convince the world of his pacific diſpoſition, yet there ſeemed no appearance of an accommodation. That he wiſhed for peace, but never would ſubmit to it upon diſhonourable terms; and therefore had concluded ſeveral treaties with the princes on the continent, in order to be ready to aſſiſt him in caſe of war being declared.

Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the addreſſes that ſhould be preſented to his majeſty on the ſubject of his ſpeech; for many lords and gentlemen diſapproved of his having concluded treaties, without previouſly aſking their advice. However, after a moſt violent conteſt, the addreſſes were preſented, which occaſioned ſeveral reſignations; particularly, that of Mr. Pitt, pay-maſter of the forces, who was ſucceeded by the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay, while Sir George Lyttleton was appointed chancellor of the exchequer in the room of Mr. Legge. When the public buſineſs came on before the houſe of commons, every thing went in favour of the miniſtry; and the treaties concluded by his majeſty were approved of by a very great majority. Subſidies were granted to the empreſs of Ruſſia, the elector of Bavaria, and the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; but the ſon of the latter, for reaſons unknown, renounced the proteſtant religion, which gave great offence to all the other princes of that perſuaſion, eſpecially to his Britannic majeſty, who had beſtowed upon him his daughter in marriage.

On the firſt of November this year, a moſt dreadful calamity happened at Liſbon, which laid great part of that city in ruins. The inquiſition having condemned ſeveral proteſtants and others, whom they conſidered as diſaffected to the Romiſh church, All-Saints day was appointed for their execution, or as they call it, the celebration of an act of faith. Many of the ignorant people from the country, had aſſembled at Liſbon, to be witneſſes of this horrid ſpectable; but as proteſtants, if found among the mob, are ſure to be treated with every mark of indignity, ſo the gentlemen of the Engliſh factory retired quietly to their apartments. During the morning the ſky had continued ſerene and clear, a cloud was not to be ſeen; but about ten o'clock in the forenoon, a moſt dreadful ſhock of an earthquake was felt, and the water in the river Tagus roſe above ten feet perpendicular. On the altars of the ſeveral churches, tapers had been lighted to celebrate the horrid ſolemnity, and the violence of the concuſſion having thrown them down, they ſet fire to the other materials, and in a few minutes the whole city ſeemed to be on a blaze. In many parts the earth opened, as if ready to devour the ſuperſtitious inhabitants, and according to the moſt moderate computation, no leſs than eight thouſand perſons of both ſexes periſhed. The ſurvivors were obliged to take ſhelter in the adjacent fields, where they could not procure the neceſſaries of life, and many of them periſhed with cold and hunger. Our ambaſſador at the court of Madrid having tranſmitted an account of this calamity to our miniſtry, his majeſty, touched with the circumſtances of the unhappy ſufferers, went to the parliament houſe, and informed the members; who, to their everlaſting honour, ordered that one hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be ſent to relieve their immediate wants. The king of Portugal was ſo ſenſible of this inſtance of Britiſh generoſity, that he wrote a moſt grateful and affecting letter to our ſovereign, promiſing that on every occaſion, for the future, he would take care to provide for the intereſt of our ſubjects when they came to ſettle in his dominions.

A rumour now took place, and was actually propaged throughout the kingdom, that the French intended to invade this nation; upon which all hopes of peace were given up, though the French ſtill ſubmitted to all the indignities which our navy offered them. It ſeems they wanted a pretence for entering into a new war, and nothing ſeemed more likely to give colour to ſuch a meaſure, as that of our men of war ſeizing the ſhips belonging to their merchants.

The Eſperance man of war, a French ſhip of eighty guns, having been ſent from Rochfort to Breſt, was met by captain Stephens in the Orford, of ſeventy guns, and after a deſperate engagement, that laſted three hours, the Frenchman, with above three hundred ſailors on board, was taken and carried into Plymouth, ſo that notwithſtanding war was not formally declared, yet the hoſtilities committed, ſhewed that it could not be far diſtant.

A. D. 1756. This year opened with parliamentary buſineſs of the moſt important nature; for it was ordered that all the old regiments, both of dragoons and foot, ſhould be augmented, and that ten new regiments of foot, beſides ſeveral troops of light horſe, ſhould be immediately raiſed. For defraying the whole public expence, the parliament granted the ſum of ſeven millions, two hundred and ninety-eight thouſand, five hundred and fifteen pounds. Many excellent laws paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament, and in general, the members were unanimous; ſo that few arguments were uſed in oppoſition, to what was propoſed by the miniſtry. War was now apparently inevitable; but while the court of Great Britain was deliberating on the moſt proper methods to be uſed in proſecuting it, an incident took place that ſurprized all Europe, and gave a new and moſt unexpected turn to the face of public affairs.

The king of Pruſſia, who had ſpent ſeveral years in cultivating the arts of peace, diſcovered ſuch profound knowledge in the art of politics, that no treaty of the moſt ſecret nature could be long concealed from him. By his ſecret emiſſaries, in different countries, he learned that the empreſs of Ruſſia, in conjunction with the French and the empreſs queen of Hungary, had entered into a league offenſive and defenſive, and that Sileſia was not only to be retaken and annexed to the houſe of Auſtria, but likewiſe all the hereditary dominions of the king of Pruſſia were to be divided among the conquerors; and this treaty was acceded to by Auguſtus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland. As we had agreed to bring ſome Ruſſian troops into the empire of Germany, in order to defend the electorate of Hanover, the Pruſſian monarch publiſhed a maniſeſto, wherein he declared that he was ready to take the field, at the head of his whole army, to oppoſe the entrance of any forces that ſhould preſume to come into the empire. This was a moſt mortifying ſtroke to our ſovereign, who imagined that his electoral dominions would be ſeized by the French; and therefore it was propoſed by our miniſtry that nothing could contribute more towards ſecuring Hanover, than that of entering into a treaty with the king of Pruſſia. Propoſals of the like nature had been made to him by the French; but he had already ſuch proofs of their perfidy, that he paid no regard to any thing advanced by them. Accordingly, it was agreed upon between him and the court of Great Britain, that in conſequence of the war having broke out in North America, there was reaſon to fear that it might extend further, both the contracting powers ſhould exert themſelves to the utmoſt, in order to prevent any foreign troops from coming into the empire, or to paſs through it, that the public peace might be maintained.

On the twenty-third of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, he informed them, there was great reaſon to fear that the French intended to invade this kingdom, becauſe of the vaſt naval preparations making by them along the coaſt. He propoſed that ſix thouſand Heſſian troops ſhould be immediately taken into the pay of Great Britain, and that they ſhould be ſent over to this kingdom to prevent the deſigns of the enemy. But what was very remarkable, was his majeſty's not having taken the leaſt notice, that general Blakeney, governor of Fort St. Philip, and Sir Benjamin Keene, our ambaſſador at the court of Madrid, had both ſent letters to the ſecretary of ſtate, informing him, that the French were fitting out a large ſquadron at Toulon, and that there was not the leaſt doubt but they intended to attack the iſland of Minorca, and the general requeſted that proper aſſiſtance ſhould be ſent him.

What could induce the miniſtry to act in ſuch a manner, will remain a ſecret for ever, ſo far as we are able to learn; but certain it is, nothing could be more unjuſtifiable, and the conſequences proved fatal to the nation. Thoſe who wiſhed well to the nation, cenſured their conduct in the ſevereſt manner, but ſtill the miniſterial influence prevailed, and bore down all oppoſition. Such as were real patriots moved, that the militia might be raiſed to defend the nation, and that no mercenary troops ſhould be hired; but the miniſtry, as if they had intended to exaſperate the people to the utmoſt, made a motion in the lower houſe, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that he would take into Britiſh pay twelve battalions of his electoral troops, and that they ſhould be brought over to this kingdom. Great oppoſition was made to this motion, but the miniſtry carried their point; in conſequence of which, the nation was, in a manner, filled with foreign troops, and the people diſcontented. The vulgar rabble, who were ever fired with indignation at the arrival of foreigners, wanted an opportunity to quarrel with theſe poor men, who could not be ſuppoſed to have any connection with public affairs; but their behaviour was ſo inoffenſive, that even their moſt inveterate enemies could not find fault with them.

The Britiſh miniſtry, who, for ſome time, appeared to act as men whoſe eyes had been ſhut, began to ſee the neceſſity they were under of protecting the iſland of Minorca; and accordingly it was reſolved that a fleet ſhould be ſent into the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng, ſon of lord Torrington, who procured a peerage by his vaſt knowledge of naval affairs. The abilities of Mr. Byng had never been called in queſtion: he had ſerved in ſeveral expeditions, and had made himſelf agreeable, both to the officers and ſeamen. No perſon could be found endowed with more ſenſibility, and humanity ſeemed to be his darling paſſion. Along with him, as ſecond in command, was Mr. Weſt, a man of great abilities, and much eſteemed both for his courage and prudence. It will ſcarcely be credited in future ages, that our miniſtry acted only upon principles of ignorance; for diſcerning perſons will aſcribe their conduct to ſomething of a criminal nature.

The fleet did not ſail from Spithead till the ſeventh of April; and during their voyage to Gibraltar, which laſted till the ſecond of May, many of the ſeamen were taken ſick, and, conſequently, the fleet much weakened. He had only one battalion of land forces on board; and when he got into the harbour of Gibraltar, general Fowke, who commanded the garriſon, refuſed to give him any of his men, alledging, as an excuſe, that he had not ſufficient to defend the place, in caſe an attack ſhould be made. He learned farther, that M. de la Galiſſoniere, the French admiral, had ſailed from Toulon with a large fleet of the line, beſides tranſports, on board of which he had no leſs than fifteen thouſand land forces, which he had landed in Minorca, and taken poſſeſſion of every thing except the fort of St. Philip.

This fleet, of which our miniſtry had received repeated accounts, ſailed from Toulon on the tenth of April, juſt three days after Mr. Byng ſailed from Portſmouth; and the inequality of the voyages being ſo great, there is no wonder that they got there before our fleet could ſo much as enter into the Mediterranean. General Blakeney, who had notice of the approach of the French, took care to provide for the ſecurity of Fort St. Philip, as far as was poſſible, conſidering what a ſmall number of men he had then under his command. It was in vain for him to attempt to defend the reſt of the iſland, and conſequently, the French forces landed, without oppoſition, at a place called Ciudadalla, on the weſtern part of the iſland, and prepared to attack Fort St. Philip. The duke de Richlieu was at the head of this expedition; and when he landed, he found that he had neglected to bring horſes with him to draw the heavy artillery over roads that had been, in a manner, rendered impaſſable by order of general Blakeney. This circumſtance obliged him to re-embark his heavy artillery, and land it at Mahon, near St. Philip's, where he intended to erect his batteries. In the mean time, the general ſent a meſſenger to the French marſhal, demanding to know why he had landed in the iſland of Minorca in a hoſtile manner; and received for anſwer, that he acted in conformity with the practice of the Engliſh, who had taken ſome of their men of war without making a public declaration of their intentions.

On the eleventh of May, the entrenchments were opened; and marſhal Richlieu ſent his compliments to general Blakeney, offering him what conditions he pleaſed to accept of; but the governor told the meſſenger, that it would be ſoon enough to treat of terms when they came ſo near each other as to be able to ſhake hands. Accordingly, the royal ſtandard was placed upon the caſtle, as a ſignal that the garriſon would defend it to the laſt extremity. But here our attention is called off to objects partly different, and partly connected with it.

Admiral Byng, while at Gibraltar, ſent an expreſs to the lords of the admiralty, informing them, that he had been ſent on an expedition at an improper ſeaſon; that he had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the French; and that there was great reaſon to fear that all his attempts would be rendered abortive. This meſſage from the admiral gave great offence to the miniſtry, who were conſcious that they had acted inconſiſtent with their duty; and therefore they cauſed a report to be propagated, that Byng would never face the French. This increaſed the public clamour; and on the nineteenth of May, the Engliſh fleet came to an anchor off the iſland of Minorca. Captain Hervey was diſpatched with a letter to general Blakeney, to inform him of the arrival of the fleet, and to know in what part of the iſland he would have the recruits landed; but before he had got out of ſight of the admiral's ſhip, the French fleet appeared, and ſeemed to be very ſtrong; but the admiral made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking them.

During the night, nothing of importance happened; and when the morning appeared, there was ſuch a thick fog, that the fleets loſt ſight of each other; but about noon the ſky clearing up, the line of battle was formed, and admiral Weſt bore down upon the French. Had Weſt been properly ſeconded, there is reaſon to believe that the enemy would have been defeated; but admiral Byng, although in every reſpect a brave officer, yet, on the preſent occaſion, laid his conduct open to much cenſure. It ſeems that the admiral was diſtracted in his opinion, whether to retreat or advance; for when the captain of his own ſhip deſired him to bear down upon the enemy, he peremptorily refuſed, leſt he ſhould fall into the ſame error as admiral Matthews had done ſome years before. No ſign of cowardice was diſcovered in the whole of Mr. Byng's conduct, but he acted in ſuch an abſurd manner, that the ſhips moſt fit for action did not come up; ſo that the enemy, who had rather acted on the defenſive, had an opportunity of ſailing away.

During four days that the Engliſh fleet remained waiting for the return of the French, ſeveral councils of war were held, in which it was at laſt agreed, that they ſhould ſet ſail for Gibraltar, not having forces ſufficient to protect Fort St. Philip. This was one of the moſt imprudent ſteps that could have been taken; for had they remained but one day longer, they would have intercepted a large fleet, laden with proviſions and military ſtores, for the uſe of the French army in Minorca. It was above a month before the fleet arrived at Gibraltar; and news of their miſcarriage being publiſhed, admiral Hawke, aſſiſted by admiral Saunders, was ſent into the Mediterranean, terranean, with orders to ſuperſede admiral Byng, who, with general Fowke, the deputy-governor of Gibraltar, were put under an arreſt, and ſent priſoners to England in the Antelope man of war, in order to be tried by two different court-martials.

In the mean time, the French carried on the ſiege of Fort St. Philip with great vigour, while the garriſon made a moſt gallant defence. The French army amounted to upwards of twenty thouſand men, with ſixty-two large battering cannon, and twenty-one mortars, which kept playing inceſſantly on the fort. On the fifteenth of June, general Blakeney ordered a moſt furious attack to be made on the enemy, by which they were, for ſome time, driven back, and many of their batteries were demoliſhed.

The ſoldiers in the garriſon did not exceed two thouſand five hundred in number; and the French general being well ſupplied with every thing neceſſary for carrying on the ſiege, deſtroyed moſt of the outworks, and then made a breach in the wall.

On the twenty-ſeventh, the duke de Richlieu put himſelf at the head of a large detachment, and attacked the place ſword in hand, which was gallantly defended by the Engliſh, who diſputed every inch of the ground with them. Several of the mines were ſprung, and ſuch execution was done upon the enemy, that great part of the glacis was covered with dead bodies. But notwithſtanding, the French continued the attack, and made themſelves maſters of two ſtrong redoubts: and colonel Jefferies, the ſecond in command under general Blakeney, was ſuddenly ſurrounded, and, with one hundred men, taken priſoners, juſt at the inſtant that he was on the point of retaking one of the redoubts. Major Cunningham, another brave officer, was ſo deſperately wounded, that he could not do his duty: ſo that the governor was deprived of the aſſiſtance of two men whoſe courage and prudence had rendered them very conſpicuous. The duke de Richlieu then ordered a parley to be beat, under pretence of burying the dead; but no ſooner had the governor granted his requeſt, than he made uſe of the time in fortifying the redoubts he had taken, by which he became maſter of all the ſubterraneous paſſages, ſo as to be able to blow up the fort. The general finding it, in a manner, impoſſible to hold out againſt ſuch a numerous army, which was daily encroaching upon him, called a council of war, in which it was reſolved that the place could not hold out any longer, but that propoſals muſt be made to the French to enter upon articles of capitulation.

The duke de Richlieu was ſo ſenſible of the bravery of the Engliſh general, that he offered them what terms they pleaſed; and accordingly they were permitted to march out with all the honours of war, and to remain in the iſland till ſhips came from Gibraltar to take them on board, which was not till the ſeventh of July. In this manner was Britain deprived of the iſland of Minorca, a place of the utmoſt importance during a war, becauſe it affords proviſions and harbours of ſafety for all ſuch veſſels as happen to go from England to the Mediterranean. The importance of it was not known till it was loſt; and had we been at war with any of the Italian ſtates, we could ſcarce have had an opportunity of ſending a fleet beyond Gibraltar.

In the beginning of this year, the earl of Loudon had been ſent to America, to take upon him the command of the army deſtined to act in that quarter of the world; but ſo negligent had the miniſtry been in fitting him out in proper time, that before he landed, he found the French general Montcalm in the field, at the head of a conſiderable army. In the mean time, Oſwego, a ſtrong fort ſituated on the lake Ontario, in Canada, was taken by the French, and all the men found in it ſent priſoners to Montreal. The loſs of this important place was owing entirely to the delays made by our miniſtry, and the altercations that took place between our generals and the coloniſts. Fort Granville fell into the hands of the French at the ſame time, which ſtruck ſuch a damp into the minds of the people, both in the mother-country and on the continent of America, that nothing was to be heard but murmurs, while the conduct of our officers was ſeverely cenſured.

In the Eaſt-Indies, the French had been very active in ſpiriting up the natives againſt our ſettlements, particularly in Bengal, where the new nabob, Surajah Dowla, took the field, and laid ſiege to the town of Calcutta. The governor, Mr. Drake, being a Quaker, refuſed to fight; ſo that the command devolved upon Mr. Holwell, who reſolved to hold it out to the laſt extremity. But the enemy's army was almoſt innumerable, and the place but poorly fortified. Add to this, that the ſhips belonging to the company had fallen down the river, which the nabob knew, and reſolved to avail himſelf of that circumſtance. He would not hearken to any terms of capitulation, although Mr. Holwell propoſed them to him, but, by mere force of numbers, ruſhing into the place, cruelly ordered the governor, with one hundred and forty-five men, to be confined in a dungeon, where one hundred and twenty-three periſhed before morning for want of freſh air. This was one of the moſt horrid tranſactions that we meet with in hiſtory; it was directly oppoſite to the laws of war, and contrary to the principles upon which civil government is founded. The governor, Mr. Holwell, with ſuch others as ſurvived, were ſent priſoners to the nabob's capital, far up the country, where they were treated with great cruelty. On the other hand, admiral Watſon defeated, and took priſoner, Angria, a famous pirate, who reigned like a ſovereign on the coaſt of Malabar; and in his caſtle was found the ſum of one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds. This was a valuable acquiſition. But we muſt now return to take a view of the ſtate of public affairs in Europe.

War had been hitherto carried on, without any public declaration thereof, either by the French or Engliſh: but as it ſeemed no way neceſſary to keep the maſk on any longer, England declared war, by proclamation, on the eighteenth of May, which was anſwered by another at Paris, in the moſt formal manner, on the eleventh of June following.

The city of London, followed by many corporations throughout the kingdom, preſented moſt loyal addreſſes to his majeſty upon the declaration of war, and promiſed to ſupport him with their lives and fortunes: ſo that our aged ſovereign had the pleaſure to find that he reigned as an object of love in the hearts of his ſubjects.

In the mean time, the empreſs of Ruſſia, highly exaſperated that we ſhould have entered into a treaty with the king of Pruſſia without conſulting her, ordered her army to be augmented conſiderably; and, at the ſame time, in order to conceal her real intentions, ordered her miniſters at foreign courts to publiſh manifeſtos, intimating, that ſhe had nothing in view but that of protecting her own dominions. The empreſs-queen of Hungary proceeded in the ſame manner; ſo that the flames of civil war were now lighted up on the continent of Europe; while the king of Pruſſia, ever attentive to his own intereſt, and the ſecurity of his ſubjects, reſolved to be beforehand with both, and prevent them from taking thoſe advantages which they intended.

No prince could ever be more active, on this occaſion, than the king of Pruſſia; for the moment he learned that the court of France had entered into an alliance with the empreſs-queen, he ordered his miniſter at the court of Dreſden to demand leave for a body of his forces to paſs through Saxony; but inſtead of receiving an anſwer, the elector ordered all his forces to be collected together, and encamped at Pirna, till ſuch time as he could receive reinforcements of Auſtrians, to enable him to take the field. This ſo exaſperated the king of Pruſſia, that he took the field at the head of a moſt formidable army, and obliged the elector of Saxony to depart to Poland, to which nation he was conducted by a body of dragoons; while all the treaſures and archives belonging to his hereditary dominions were ſeized, and his army made priſoners of war. Leipſic ſurrendered at the ſame time to the conqueror; and the people were obliged to provide, not only all ſorts of neceſſaries for the Pruſſian army, but alſo to furniſh them with money to carry on their conqueſts.

On the firſt of October, the king of Pruſſia came up with the Auſtrian army, and reſolved to give them battle, having firſt ſhewn his generals the ſituation of the ground, and acquainted them with the ſteps that he intended to take. The Auſtrians having neglected to take poſſeſſion of ſome riſing grounds, the king of Pruſſia gave orders for his troops to advance, and attack the enemy's cavalry, who were poſted in an adjoining plain. Indeed, the attack was made with ſo much fury, that the Auſtrian cavalry gave way, and fell back upon the infantry: upon which the Pruſſians advanced with ſuch courage, that although ſixty pieces of cannon played upon them, yet they made themſelves maſters of all the ditches and defiles. The Auſtrian army being thus put into confuſion, they began to give way, which the king of Pruſſia obſerving, ordered the whole body of his infantry to advance, and wheel about to the left, where they attacked the ſuburbs of Lowoſchutz, and reduced the whole to a heap of aſhes. Count Brown, who commanded the Auſtrian army, was obliged to retreat in the beſt manner he could, leaving the honour of the victory to the Pruſſians, after an engagement that laſted from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. The Pruſſian monarch was not, however, able to make his enterprize of any great advantage to himſelf, for the winter approaching, he was obliged to put his troops into quarters of cantonment at Dreſden, and along the Elbe. Count Schwerin commanded another part of his army, which had penetrated into Bohemia; and they finding that proviſions could not eaſily be procured, returned towards Sileſia, and took up their quarters in the province of Glatz.

The diſcontents among the people of England were now increaſed to ſuch an height, that it was found neceſſary to make ſome changes in the miniſtry. Accordingly, the duke of Devonſhire was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury, in room of the duke of Newcaſtle; Mr. Legge was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; earl Temple was made firſt lord of the Admiralty; and the ſeals, as ſecretary of ſtate, were given to Mr. Pitt, one of the greateſt ſtateſmen that ever lived in Britain.

On the ſecond of December, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers; and the commons being ſent for, he told them, that, under the protection of the divine providence, he doubted not but he ſhould be able to fruſtrate all the ſchemes hatched againſt him by his perfidious enemies. He told them, that nothing could ſo much engage his attention, next to the mother country, as the preſervation of America; and, for that reaſon, that the war ſhould be proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour. He added, that nothing could contribute more towards diſtreſſing the enemy, than internal peace among his ſubjects; and therefore recommended to them unanimity in all their deliberations. The militia (he ſaid) was one of the moſt favourite objects he had in view, with reſpect to the preſervation of the nation; and therefore he told them, that it was their duty to put it upon the moſt reſpectable footing. He concluded by telling them, that no meaſure ſhould be undertaken by him, but by the advice of his parliament, in whom he placed the utmoſt confidence. Both houſes preſented the moſt loyal and affectionate addreſſes, and then proceeded to the diſpatch of public buſineſs.

A. D. 1757. The committee of ſupply granted his majeſty the privilege of keeping on foot forty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred ſoldiers, and fifty-five thouſand ſeamen. The Heſſians and Hanoverians were ſtill kept in pay, but moſt cruelly uſed by the people: for one of them having committed a miſdemeanor, puniſhable in this country by the common law, his commander not knowing any difference between municipal and military law, ordered him to be tried by a court-martial. This part of the officer's conduct, although not juſtifiable, yet could not be attended with any dangerous conſequences, eſpecially as the man was a ſoldier, and a foreigner; but notwithſtanding, the people were exaſperated to ſuch a degree of madneſs, that they would not ſuffer them to lodge in their houſes. Diſtreſſed as theſe poor creatures were with cold, they never complained, but lay in the fields in tents till the month of January, when the legiſlative power, in the moſt compaſſionate manner, made proper proviſion for them.

The great dearth of corn, owing to the iniquitous practice of engroſſing, reduced many perſons, and indeed the nation in general, to great diſtreſs. Tumults happened in almoſt every part of the kingdom; which is not to be wondered at, when it is conſidered, that the people were ſtarving in the midſt of plenty. His majeſty, touched with the ſufferings of his people, recommended their diſtreſſed condition to parliament; and an act was paſſed to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of all ſorts of grain.

As there was too much reaſon to fear that the French would invade this kingdom, and as it was neceſſary that great part of our regular forces ſhould be employed abroad, ſo a bill was brought into parliament to eſtabliſh a national militia, on an extenſive and uſeful plan. This was ſuch a conſtitutional meaſure, as gave pleaſure to the nation in general; and yet ſome diſcontented perſons exclaimed ſo loudly againſt it, that many of the people, particularly in Yorkſhire, actually roſe in a body, and demoliſhed the houſe where the juſtices of the peace and deputy lieutenants had met to make choice of ſuch as were to ſerve.

On the fifteenth of February, his majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, to inform them, that the French were daily pouring ſuch numbers of troops into Germany, that there was reaſon to fear they had ſome deſign on his electoral dominions. He therefore recommended Hanover to their protection, not doubting but his faithful commons would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt. In anſwer to this meſſage, moſt loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes; and it was voted, that an annual ſubſidy ſhould be paid to the king of Pruſſia, and that an army of obſervation ſhould act on the borders of Hanover, under the command of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, to watch the motions of the French, and preſerve that electorate from their making any encroachments upon it.

At the ſame time, great preparations were made for the naval ſervice; and a deſign was formed to take from the French Louiſbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. Sir Edward Hawke, with the admirals Saunders and Oſborne, were ſent to North-America with conſiderable fleets; and general Hopſon, with lord Charles Hay, had under them ſix thouſand two hundred land forces. Two ſquadrons were diſpatched at the ſame time, one to the Eaſt, and the other to the Weſt-Indies; ſo that every thing was done for the intereſt of the nation: but ſuch of the former miniſtry as had been diſcarded, made ſuch oppoſition to theſe meaſures, that Mr. Pitt, and the honourable Mr. Legge, who had acted as the moſt ſteady and upright patriots againſt every thing that ſeemed to threaten any hurt to the nation, were commanded to reſign. They did not, however, retire from public buſineſs, without receiving the approbation of their fellow ſubjects; for moſt of the cities and corporations preſented them with addreſſes, and their freedom in gold boxes.

Diſtreſs and diſcontent, during the firſt part of this year, reigned in every part of the nation. Bread was ſo dear, that the poor could ſcarce purchaſe it. And although admiral Byng, whoſe conduct had given ſuch offence, had been ſhot at Portſmouth, yet the people in general looked upon him as rather unfor tunate than criminal. They conſidered him as one who had been ſacrificed to ſcreen the miniſtry from cenſure; and although a parliamentary enquiry was made into their conduct, yet they contrived to act in ſuch a manner, that the whole came to nothing. The only good effects attending the execution of the admiral was, the riviving a true ſpirit of courage among our officers, both by ſea and land. From this circumſtance they ſaw and were convinced, that no ſtation, let it be ever ſo dignified, could ſcreen them from puniſhment; and that the only way to true honour and real glory, was to diſcharge their duty faithfully.

His majeſty finding the public clamour extremely high, made another change in his miniſtry; and Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were reinſtated in their former employments, to the inexpreſſible pleaſure of the nation in general. The parliament was prorogued on the fourth of July, when his majeſty thanked the commons for the generous ſupply granted for the ſupport of the war, and recommended to them to carry with them, to their reſpective counties, a ſpirit of unanimity, as the moſt ſure means of procuring the favour of divine providence.

In France, a circumſtance had nearly happened that might have changed the face of public affairs; namely, an attempt to murder the king. Francis Damien, a native of French Flanders, was the perſon who undertook the performance of this action. He had lived ſome years as a footman in different families in Paris, but had been turned away for an obſtinate temper, and a certain gloomineſs that made him diſagreeable to all thoſe with whom he had any connections. It does not appear that he had any accomplices, nor could the torture itſelf make him diſcover what were his motives. On the fifth of January, about ſix in the evening, as the king was getting into his coach to go to Trianon, on a viſit to his daughter, the unhappy wretch, having concealed a large claſp knife under his cloak, ſlipped thro' the guards and made a ſtroke at the king with his knife. The point pierced between the fourth and fifth ribs, but it was not mortal; and the aſſaſſin, who ſeemed not to be any ways concerned, was immediately ſeized and committed to priſon. He was ſoon after brought to his trial, according to the laws of France, and executed in ſuch a horrid manner, as is even ſhocking to relate. Inciſions were made in his fleſh with red hot pincers, and melted lead poured into them. In that manner the poor wretch was tortured ſeveral hours, and then torn in pieces by four horſes, after which his quarters were reduced to aſhes.

The French, in the ſpring of this year, had ſent two armies to Germany; the one, conſiſting of eighty thouſand men, under the command of marſhal d'Etrees, an officer of the moſt undaunted courage, and under him were marſhal de Contades, and the count de St. Germain, who had been from their moſt early infancy, accuſtomed to arms. The other army conſiſted only of twenty-five thouſand men, becauſe it was to be joined by a body of Auſtrians; but the grand army was to attack Hanover. In Bohemia, one hundred thouſand Auſtrians had taken the field; an equal number of Ruſſians were marching through Poland; while the Swedes, croſſing the Baltic, attacked the moſt important places in Pomerania. Surrounded on all ſides with enemies, the king of Pruſſia, inſtead of being diſcouraged, ſeemed rather to encreaſe every day in all thoſe arts of heroiſm that conſtitute the character of an able general.

In the beginning of the year he marched from Dreſden, acroſs two bridges thrown over the Elbe, attended by field marſhal Keith, and ſeveral other generals of approved abilities. They marched in three bodies or diviſions, nor did the Auſtrians ſo much as know that he had taken the field till he had advanced a conſiderable way into Bohemia. He ordered the prince of Bevern to march as if he had intended to attack Egra, with a ſmall detachment of the army; upon which count Brown, the Auſtrian general, ſent Aremberg, with a detachment, to oppoſe him. This was juſt what the king of Pruſſia wiſhed for; and laying hold of that circumſtance, wheeled to the right, and cut off all communication between the grand army of the Auſtrians and the detachment under general Aremberg. This was ſuch a maſter-piece of generalſhip as is ſcarce to be met with in hiſtory; but the Auſtrians did not underſtand it. They imagined that the king intended to retreat, and conſequently were drawn off their guard and led into a ſnare.

On the fifth of April the prince of Bevern, having paſſed ſome of the moſt dangerous defiles, gained a complete victory over the detachment of the Auſtrian army, and ſo opened the whole country for the reſt of the Pruſſian forces. In the mean time the king kept marching along the Elbe, to obſerve the motions of count Brown, and drove the Auſtrians from their ſtrong camp at Budin.

On the ſixth of May, the different detachments of the Auſtrians being collected together, inſtead of attacking the Pruſſians, encamped on the banks of the Moldau, near Prague. There the king of Pruſſia, as if no enterprize had been too great for his abilities, attempted to flank count Brown, who had no other means left but that of wheeling to the right, to ſave his army. Every difficulty gave way to the Pruſſians; one defile was taken after another; but in one of their attacks on an advanced body of the Auſtrians, field-marſhal Schwerin, a brave officer, was killed at the age of eighty-two, crowned with military glory, and ſincerely regretted by his ſovereign, who had long been convinced, that he was one of the braveſt generals that ever commanded an army.

This brought on a general engagement, and the Pruſſians, with the moſt amazing courage, broke through the right wing of the Auſtrians, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral batteries; while a body of cavalry broke the front line, and put the whole into ſuch confuſion, that above ſix thouſand were killed; among whom were ſeveral generals, beſides marſhal Brown, the commander in chief. The Pruſſians drove the Auſtrians into the city of Prague, and in four days the trenches were opened and lines of circumvallation drawn. It could not be ſuppoſed that ſuch a vaſt army as that of the Auſtrians would be able to ſubſiſt long in a city that had not proviſions ſufficient for the inhabitants; and therefore prince Charles of Lorrain reſolved to cut his way through the Pruſſian lines, at the head of twelve thouſand men. The time agreed upon for putting this ſcheme in execution was the middle of the night; but in the mean time, one of the Auſtrian ſoldiers having deſerted, gave an account of the whole to the king of Pruſſia, who took care to be upon his guard, ſo that the prince, with his party, was defeated, and obliged once more to take refuge in the city. The heavy artillery belonging to the Pruſſians being now arrived, a moſt dreadful cannonade began, and great part of the city was reduced to a heap of rubbiſh. Proviſions were become ſo ſcarce, that they were obliged to eat horſes fleſh; and the Pruſſians, who had hitherto acted as men whom no oppoſition could reſiſt, began to imagine that the whole Auſtrian army would be made priſoners, and the dominions of the empreſs queen of Hungary be divided among them. Vienna itſelf was in danger of being beſieged, for every place lay open to their victorious arms; but a circumſtance took place that gave a general turn to public affairs, and convinced his Pruſſian majeſty that he had a weak ſide as well as others.

Leopald, count Daun, who had ſerved many years in the army of the empreſs queen without ever riſing higher than the rank of a major-general, was appointed to take upon him the command of the army. Like the Roman Fabius, he was cautious, that he never acted offenſively till, in human probability, he had a proſpect of ſucceeding, and then he proſecuted his meaſures with the utmoſt perſeverance. Calm and deliberate, he viewed victory as uncertain; and on every occaſion, took care to ſecure a retreat. He did not, like ſome generals, deſpiſe the enemy he had to engage with; but knowing that the moſt trifling circumſtance was able to turn the fortune of the day, he reſolved never to enter upon any thing with raſhneſs, but rather to preſerve his army for a more proper opportunity, when an unguarded moment might ſecure victory, ſave the territories of his ſovereign, and diſappoint all the ſchemes formed by thoſe who were fluſhed with hopes, in conſequence of recent ſucceſſes.

Such were the qualities of this brave general, whom the Auſtrian miniſtry pitched upon as the moſt proper perſon to retrieve their loſſes, and ſave the army, which was then in the utmoſt diſtreſs in the city of Prague. He collected together the fugitives that had run away after the late battle, and having received freſh ſupplies, he formed a camp at Rolin, near Prague. A communication was opened with that city, ſo that the garriſon was daily ſupplied with proviſions. This was a moſt galling ſtroke to the king of Pruſſia, who was tired out with the continuance of the ſiege, and therefore reſolved to attack count Daun in his camp, where he was ſtrongly entrenched. This was one of the moſt imprudent actions that could have been committed; and marſhal Keith, who ſaw what would be the conſequence thereof, remonſtrated to the king againſt it. He told him, that no meaſure was ſo proper as that of carrying on the ſiege, and waiting for count Daun, who, if he preſumed to attack the Pruſſian army in their lines, would undoubtedly be defeated; whereas, on the other hand, an attempt upon him in his camp would be attended with two dangers; namely, a defeat, and an opportunity for the Auſtrian army to eſcape out of Prague. But nothing could prevail with the king; he looked on his troops as invincible; and in conſequence thereof, on the thirteenth of June, he left his camp before Prague, and joined the prince of Bevern, who had advanced to a place called Milkowitz.

The Auſtrians under count Daun, were encamped in the moſt advantageous manner, on three riſing grounds, ſo that it ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to diſlodge them; but the Pruſſian monarch, relying on the courage and valour of his troops, began the attack about three in the afternoon, and by the moſt invincible courage, they made themſelves maſters of two of the riſing grounds. The third encampment, however, baffled all their attempts; and it being utterly impracticable to bring up the horſe, they were obliged to give way, which threw the king into the moſt violent paſſions, eſpecially when he recollected that he had acted contrary to the opinion of marſhal Keith.

Great numbers of men were killed on both ſides, and the Pruſſian monarch was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Prague, and retreat in the beſt manner he could. The Auſtrians attempted to haraſs him, but his men behaved with ſuch bravery, that they loſt but few of their number; and count Daun entered the city of Prague in triumph. The Pruſſian monarch was ſo ſenſible of his error, that in a letter to marſhal Keith, he took the whole blame upon himſelf, and declared that no troops could ever have acted with greater bravery than the Auſtrians.

Nothing, however, could damp his ſpirits, his uſual bravery gave life to all his actions; and altho' guilty of an error very common in war, he reſolved to profit by miſtakes, and riſe ſuperior to miſfortune. He was ſurrounded by enemies on every ſide, his reſources for carrying on the war were to be drawn from his own dominions, which were then on the point of being invaded by the Ruſſians; but he reſolved to act with more prudence for the future, and make caution a concomitant of courage.

The king of Great Britain was ſo equitable in all his proceedings, that although obliged to defend Hanover, yet leſt he ſhould give the leaſt offence to any of the German princes, he ordered a manifeſto to be publiſhed; wherein was pointed out the deſigns of the French, and the neceſſity his majeſty was under to protect his electoral dominions. As ſoon as this manifeſto was publiſhed, the duke of Cumberland aſſembled the army of obſervation, and marching from Hanover, croſſed the Weſer near Retburgh, which he took from the French, and there eſtabliſhed his head quarters.

His royal highneſs had diſpoſed of his troops in the moſt admirable manner; for they ſtretched out in one line of different detachments, under the command of the moſt experienced generals; but they had not been long at Retburgh, when the duke learned that the French army was marching from the Lower Rhine, and that their deſign was to cut off his communication with the Weſer. The French, whoſe numbers were double to that of the allies, continued marching forward, and his royal highneſs was obliged to repaſs the Weſer, as he had not ſtrength ſufficient to venture on an engagement. The river Weſer is on each ſide ſurrounded with high banks, and certain it is, that the duke, notwithſtanding the inferiority of the numbers, might have made a violent oppoſition to the French, and diſputed their paſſage inch by inch; but inſtead of that, they were ſuffered to croſs on temporary bridges without the loſs of a ſingle man. They then ſeized the important paſs of Stadt Oldendorff, which opened a paſſage into Hanover, and that electorate was laid under very heavy contributions.

On the evening of the fourth of July, the duke ordered in all his detached parties, and drew up in order of battle, but the ſoldiers were obliged to reſt all night on their arms. About five next morning, the French cannon began to play upon that wing of the army that was compoſed of Heſſians; and altho' they were cut down in whole ranks, yet they continued firm and immoveable. About eight in the morning the ſmall arms began to fire, and certain it is, the allied army behaved with as much bravery as ever was diſplayed in a field of battle, for they were not ſo much as put into the leaſt diſorder.

The only fault committed by the allies was the ſuffering the grenadiers, who compoſed the center, and were drawn up in a wood, to defile off in order to ſtrengthen the right wing; for by that movement the French were enabled to penetrate ſo far, that one of the Hanoverian batteries fell into their hands. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick behaved, on this occaſion, with the moſt ſingular bravery; for putting himſelf at the head of a body of grenadiers, retook the battery with their bayonets fixed, although the French party, whom they drove from it, were double their number.

The French, however, were in poſſeſſion of two riſing grounds, on which they had erected ſtrong batteries; and as it would have been next to impoſſible to have taken them, the duke, after doing all that could be performed by an able general, found himſelf under the neceſſity of ſounding a retreat. This was one of the moſt obſtinate engagements during the whole of the laſt war, for it laſted full three days, and the French loſt four times as many men as the allies, while the retreat made by the latter was ſo well conducted, that the enemy were afraid to purſue.

The allied army marched to Nienburg, where they encamped; while the French took Hamelen, and demoliſhed the fortifications. The duke de Richlieu was, by the intrigues of madame Pompadour, ſent to ſuperſede all the other French generals in Germany; and in the beginning of Auguſt he ſent a detachment, under the duke de Chevereuſe, to take poſſeſſion of the city of Hanover. The garriſon were permitted to go where they pleaſed, and the regency, finding it impoſſible to oppoſe ſuperior numbers, ordered the citizens to remain quiet till ſuch time as things ſhould happen to take a different turn.

tunate than criminal. They conſidered him as one who had been ſacrificed to ſcreen the miniſtry from cenſure; and although a parliamentary enquiry was made into their conduct, yet they contrived to act in ſuch a manner, that the whole came to nothing. The only good effects attending the execution of the admiral was, the riviving a true ſpirit of courage among our officers, both by ſea and land. From this circumſtance they ſaw and were convinced, that no ſtation, let it be ever ſo dignified, could ſcreen them from puniſhment; and that the only way to true honour and real glory, was to diſcharge their duty faithfully.

His majeſty finding the public clamour extremely high, made another change in his miniſtry; and Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were reinſtated in their former employments, to the inexpreſſible pleaſure of the nation in general. The parliament was prorogued on the fourth of July, when his majeſty thanked the commons for the generous ſupply granted for the ſupport of the war, and recommended to them to carry with them, to their reſpective counties, a ſpirit of unanimity, as the moſt ſure means of procuring the favour of divine providence.

In France, a circumſtance had nearly happened that might have changed the face of public affairs; namely, an attempt to murder the king. Francis Damien, a native of French Flanders, was the perſon who undertook the performance of this action. He had lived ſome years as a footman in different families in Paris, but had been turned away for an obſtinate temper, and a certain gloomineſs that made him diſagreeable to all thoſe with whom he had any connections. It does not appear that he had any accomplices, nor could the torture itſelf make him diſcover what were his motives. On the fifth of January, about ſix in the evening, as the king was getting into his coach to go to Trianon, on a viſit to his daughter, the unhappy wretch, having concealed a large claſp knife under his cloak, ſlipped thro' the guards and made a ſtroke at the king with his knife. The point pierced between the fourth and fifth ribs, but it was not mortal; and the aſſaſſin, who ſeemed not to be any ways concerned, was immediately ſeized and committed to priſon. He was ſoon after brought to his trial, according to the laws of France, and executed in ſuch a horrid manner, as is even ſhocking to relate. Inciſions were made in his fleſh with red hot pincers, and melted lead poured into them. In that manner the poor wretch was tortured ſeveral hours, and then torn in pieces by four horſes, after which his quarters were reduced to aſhes.

The French, in the ſpring of this year, had ſent two armies to Germany; the one, conſiſting of eighty thouſand men, under the command of marſhal d'Etrees, an officer of the moſt undaunted courage, and under him were marſhal de Contades, and the count de St. Germain, who had been from their moſt early infancy, accuſtomed to arms. The other army conſiſted only of twenty-five thouſand men, becauſe it was to be joined by a body of Auſtrians; but the grand army was to attack Hanover. In Bohemia, one hundred thouſand Auſtrians had taken the field; an equal number of Ruſſians were marching through Poland; while the Swedes, croſſing the Baltic, attacked the moſt important places in Pomerania. Surrounded on all ſides with enemies, the king of Pruſſia, inſtead of being diſcouraged, ſeemed rather to encreaſe every day in all thoſe arts of heroiſm that conſtitute the character of an able general.

In the beginning of the year he marched from Dreſden, acroſs two bridges thrown over the Elbe, attended by field marſhal Keith, and ſeveral other generals of approved abilities. They marched in three bodies or diviſions, nor did the Auſtrians ſo much as know that he had taken the field till he had advanced a conſiderable way into Bohemia. He ordered the prince of Bevern to march as if he had intended to attack Egra, with a ſmall detachment of the army; upon which count Brown, the Auſtrian general, ſent Aremberg, with a detachment, to oppoſe him. This was juſt what the king of Pruſſia wiſhed for; and laying hold of that circumſtance, wheeled to the right, and cut off all communication between the grand army of the Auſtrians and the detachment under general Aremberg. This was ſuch a maſter-piece of generalſhip as is ſcarce to be met with in hiſtory; but the Auſtrians did not underſtand it. They imagined that the king intended to retreat, and conſequently were drawn off their guard and led into a ſnare.

The garriſon were permitted to go where they pleaſed, and the regency, finding it impoſſible to oppoſe ſuperior numbers, ordered the citizens to remain quiet till ſuch time as things ſhould happen to take a different turn.

The duke of Cumberland continued retreating towards the dutchy of Verden, and from thence to Stade, where the moſt valuable of the records had been depoſited; and on the glacis of that city he formed a camp. His royal highneſs drew up his lines in the beſt manner conſiſtent with the ſituation of the ground: but the greateſt abilities are of little, or, indeed, no ſervice, when oppoſed by ſuch numbers as the French army under the duke de Richlieu conſiſted of.

The allies, under the duke, now found themſelves almoſt incloſed by the enemy, and under an abſolute neceſſity of either being compelled to ſurrender priſoners of war, or fight with unequal numbers, under every diſadvantage. In this diſtreſſed ſituation, the king of Denmark interpoſed as a mediator, and a convention was ſigned by the generals on both ſides, in conſequence of which, no leſs than forty thouſand Hanoverians, Heſſians, &c. were obliged to lay down their arms, and go into quarters of cantonment. This treaty was ſigned at a place called Cloſter Seven, and gave great offence to his late majeſty; for by it the dominions of his Pruſſian majeſty were left expoſed to the French, who would not neglect to avail themſelves of ſuch a circumſtance. A declaration was publiſhed at London on the ſixteenth of September, wherein his majeſty diſclaimed all knowledge of any thing relating to the convention at Cloſter Seven, and that he had not given the duke power to conclude it; ſo that he would ſtill act in concert with the king of Pruſſia.

Whatever the impartial reader may think, muſt be left to himſelf; yet ſurely the duke of Cumberland had not force ſufficient to oppoſe the French; and undoubtedly, had he engaged, he would have been defeated. On the other hand, in conſequence of the convention, the king of Pruſſia's territories were expoſed to the French, who penetrated into them, and committed the moſt horrid barbarities, exacting contributions of a moſt exorbitant nature, and putting thoſe exactions in force by military execution.

In the mean time, the Ruſſians, who had entered Ducal Pruſſia, continued their march, under the generals Apraxin and Fermor, and ſpread ſuch deſolation wherever they came, as had ſeldom happened ſince the Roman empire was over-run by the Goths and Vandals. Pomerania, eſpecially that part of it belonging to the king of Pruſſia, was ravaged and depopulated by the Swedes. Count Daun had penetrated into Sileſia: the French, under the prince de Soubiſe, were advancing towards Saxony; and the whole dominions of the king of Pruſſia were given up for loſt. But nothing could diſcourage that prince, nor damp the bravery of his ſpirits. The barbarities committed by the Ruſſians were ſuch, that the king of Pruſſia reſolved to attack them firſt, and this brought on a general engagement on the thirtieth of Auguſt. The Ruſſians, on this occaſion, behaved with great intrepidity; whole ranks, and even lines, were cut down: but notwithſtanding, they knew not what it was to retreat. The victory was diſputed by both, but the loſs of men was greateſt on the part of the Ruſſians.

Riſing ſuperior to every misfortune, and ſoaring above impending danger, his Pruſſian majeſty having left ſome men to guard the paſſes which lead towards Bohemia, marched in order to meet the combined armies of France and the Empire, under the princes de Soubiſe and Saxe Hilburghauſen, and came up with them at Roſbach on the morning of the fifth of November, when the Pruſſians obtained a compleat victory, with the loſs of only a few men. An orator, ſpeaking of the conduct of the Pruſſians on this memorable day, has the following words: "Religion marched in the van with indignant look; Liberty flew along the ranks, and enflamed the zeal of the warriors; while the omnipotent Jehovah thundered through the embattled ſquadrons, and their enemies lay vanquiſhed at their feet." Here the king of Pruſſia, and all his army, behaved with ſuch courage, and made the diſpoſitions with ſuch prudence, that the enemy were cut off in vaſt numbers, and the greateſt part of their baggage and ammunition was taken, beſides many priſoners.

On the twelfth of November, the king ſet out to aſſiſt the prince of Bevern, who was then in Sileſia, and in his way thither, a party of four thouſand ſoldiers, who had been priſoners among the Auſtrians, and had made their eſcape, joined him; and meeting with ſeveral parties of huſſars and croats, they diſperſed them, and ſeized the proviſions they were eſcorting to the army.

At laſt the king came up with the Auſtrian army near Schweidnitz, and a moſt bloody battle enſued, in which the Pruſſians obtained a compleat victory, though dearly bought. The Auſtrians, after doing every thing that brave men could perform, were obliged to retreat, and take ſhelter under the walls of Breſlaw, which had lately fallen into their hands.

Future ages will read with admiration an account of a prince defeating a large army on the fifth of November, and on the fifth of December repeating the ſame, though great part of his army was compoſed of young recruits, who had never before ſeen an engagement. The king immediately purſued the Auſtrians, and undertook the ſiege of Breſlaw, which ſurrendered in a few days, and thirteen thouſand men were made priſoners of war. The military cheſt, containing the ammunition, was taken at the ſame time; and the king, in compaſſion to his army, who had performed wonders, ordered them into quarters of cantonment during the reſt of the winter.

In the mean time, the Hanoverians, who had been confined from action by a treaty of neutrality, were ſo cruelly oppreſſed by the French, that they reſolved to ſhake off the yoke of ſlavery; and the king of Britain ſent a commiſſion to prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, to put himſelf at the head of the army in that electorate. Hoſtilities being thus commenced, the French, by order of the duke de Richlieu, committed greater cruelties than ever in Hanover: and the empreſs-queen ordered a manifeſto to be publiſhed, complaining of the conduct of the court of London, in having violated the treaty of Cloſter-Seven. This, however, was not regarded; and that haughty woman, whoſe mind boiled with reſentment, ordered the two towns of Oſtend and Newport to be put into the hands of the French, in order to diſtreſs the trade of England. All theſe meaſures were countenanced by the Dutch, who acted as the moſt mercenary wretches, being hireling to all parties, without ever taking the leaſt part in the war.

With reſpect to the naval tranſactions during this year, the Engliſh cruizers and privateers made ſeveral captures: but although they diſtreſſed the enemy, yet they acquired but little advantage to themſelves. In the Weſt-Indies, captain Forreſt, in the Auguſta, accompanied by ſome other ſhips, cruized off the bay of Cape François, although a large ſquadron of French men of war were lying at the ſame place. The French admiral not knowing how to juſtify his conduct if he remained inactive, reſolved to attack the Engliſh, and, for that purpoſe, ſailed out of the harbour. Captain Forreſt, who watched all his motions, no ſooner ſaw him hoiſt his ſails, than he prepared to meet him, and ſhortened ſail, in order to give the enemy time to come up. About noon the French fleet, conſiſting of four ſhips of the line and three frigates, formed into one line; and the Engliſh captain ordered the Dreadnought and the Edinburgh to attack them. The engagement began with great fury, but the bravery of the Engliſh bore down all oppoſition; and towards the evening, the French were obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs.

The Engliſh, who could not, conſiſtent with their own ſafety, purſue the enemy, kept all night under ſail in the bay; and next morning ſeized a large fleet of French merchant ſhips, which were carried into Jamaica, and there ſold as legal prizes.

On the firſt of December, the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed them, that although things had turned out contrary to his expectations and the juſtice of his cauſe, yet he was determined in his own mind to proſecute the war with vigour; for which purpoſe he depended on divine providence and the aſſiſtance of his faithful commons. He expatiated largely on the late ſucceſſes which the king of Pruſſia had obtained over his enemies in Germany; and took notice to the commons, that the eyes of all Europe were turned towards them, as the perſons who, in all human probability, were moſt likely to eſtabliſh the public tranquillity. He concluded by recommending to them the neceſſity they were under to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, whoſe victories in Germany would weaken the power of the French; and the moſt dutiful and loyal addreſſes were preſented.

A. D. 1758. As ſoon as the holidays were over, the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the kingdom in general; and made ſeveral laws, laying a tax on ſome branches of luxury, particularly on ſilver plate, which was charged ſixpence each ounce. Several licences were obliged to be taken out for vending ſuch things as ſeemed not, in their own nature, neceſſary: and, upon the whole, the commons granted the ſupplies in the moſt liberal manner.

The regular payment of wages due to ſeamen was, during this ſeſſion, eſtabliſhed into a law, which has been of infinite ſervice to that uſeful body of men: and the laws relating to the militia being found defective, a new bill was brought in, by which they were explained and amended.

On the twentieth of June, after ſeveral acts had paſſed, and every thing been done for the ſecurity of the nation, the parliament was prorogued by commiſſion; and the commons were given to underſtand, that their conduct, during the whole of the ſeſſion, had given his majeſty the utmoſt ſatisfaction.

The ſubjects of Great-Britain were unanimous in applauding the conduct of Mr. Pitt, who had the principal ſhare in the management of public buſineſs; and it muſt be acknowledged, that no miniſter ever acted with greater courage, wiſdom, or perſeverance. He was a true judge of merit under every character, and in every ſtation; and ſuch accompliſhed men were made choice of by him to command the army and the navy, that the Britiſh glory roſe to the higheſt pitch of grandeur. Such was the internal ſtate of Britain at the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament; ſo that, conſiſtent with the order of things, we muſt take a view of what was tranſacting on the continent.

The king of Pruſſia had made ſuch excellent uſe of the ſucceſſes that had attended his arms during the remainder of the laſt year, that the Ruſſians were obliged to diſperſe themſelves in Poland for want of ſubſiſtence; and the Swedes, who had over-run Pomerania, were ſo much haraſſed by the Pruſſian ſoldiers, who drove them from one place to another, that they were obliged to take ſhelter in Stralſund. The Auſtrians, who had been driven out of Sileſia, took refuge in Bohemia; and although the Pruſſian monarch had armies, to the amount of three hundred thouſand men, to contend with, yet the ſame magnanimity which had diſtinguiſhed every part of his conduct, ſhone now more conſpicuous than ever. The French were meditating ſchemes for annexing Hanover to their own dominions; and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, who had no reaſon to expect any favours from ſuch perfidious enemies, yet entered into a treaty with Lewis XV. wherein he promiſed to withdraw his troops from aſſiſting the Hanoverians, and employ them in the ſervice of France. This was one of the moſt ungrateful propoſals that, perhaps, ever had been made; and it conveys to us a very mean idea of the fidelity of German princes. The landgrave had been long ſupported by the Engliſh; he had entered into a treaty of the moſt ſolemn nature with our ſovereign; but here, like a mean, mercenary wretch, he recedes from all his engagements, and turns his back upon his moſt generous benefactor. Nor was it much better with the duke of Brunſwick, who, although under many obligations to us, promiſed to act in concert with the French; but all his ſchemes were defeated by the conduct of his brother prince Ferdinand, who commanded the allied army; and that of his ſon, the hereditary prince, who acted under his uncle.

The French, who had made themſelves maſters of Bremen, and ſome other places belonging to the German empire, were ſoon driven from them by a detachment, under the prince of Holſtein Gottorp; while the duke de Richlieu, who had behaved in the moſt cruel manner to the Hanoverians, was ſuperſeded, and the command of the army given to the count de Clermont. This new general, as ſoon as he had reviewed the army, found it in a moſt wretched condition, in conſequence of the relaxation of diſcipline, the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, and the almoſt total want of all the common neceſſaries of life. He knew, that, under ſuch circumſtances, it would be an act of madneſs to attempt any thing againſt prince Ferdinand; and therefore thought it moſt prudent to retreat towards the Rhine, while the hereditary prince of Brunſwick haraſſed his rear, and ſeized the greateſt part of the baggage.

The duke de Randau, the French governor at Hanover, who had done every thing to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers, and in all things diſcharged his duty as a man of honour and humanity, ordered all the magazine of proviſions to be diſtributed among the poor; and, upon the whole, left behind him ſuch an amiable character, as ſhines far more conſpicuous than all the blandiſhments of military honours.

The prince of Brunſwick made every diſpoſition that could be thought of for diſlodging the French from ſuch places as they were ſtill in poſſeſſion of in the electorate of Hanover; and the garriſon of Hoya, a ſtrong town on the Weſer, was taken, and all the military ſtores fell into the hands of the allies. Minden was taken at the ſame time, and the French now found that they were loſing ground every day.

The count de Clermont having croſſed the Rhine, cantoned his forces along the banks of that river; while prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick took poſſeſſion of Munſter, from whence his detached parties iſſued with ſuch rapidity, that they beat up the quarters of the French, and drove them from all their advanced poſts. This was ſhocking news to the haughty French king, whoſe armies had been hitherto conducted by men raiſed to office through the intrigues of his miſtreſs: but now it was found neceſſary to change both men and meaſures. The duke de Belleiſle was placed at the head of the war department; and, like a real lover of his country, he boldly repreſented to his ſovereign, that the conduct of his generals in Germany had been ſo inconſiſtent with the duty they owed to the public, that they deſerved the higheſt cenſures. He, at the ſame time, ſent letters to the colonels of regiments, commanding them, in his majeſty's name, not to expoſe any commiſſions to ſale, but to beſtow them according to merit and ſeniority, becauſe ſuch only are qualified to ſerve in the army, and conduct the buſineſs of war, who have acquired knowledge by experience.

On the twenty-third of June, both armies met at a place called Crevelt, and a moſt obſtinate engagement enſued, when the French were obliged to give way, but their retreat was covered by their dragoons, who behaved with the greateſt courage imaginable. This victory, which coſt the allies many of their beſt forces, was yet far from being deciſive: for although ſeveral towns ſurrendered to them, among which was the city of Duſſeldorp, yet the enemy took refuge under the walls of Cologne; and juſt about the ſame time, the marſhal de Contades was ſent to take upon him the command of the French army. Prince Ferdinand had propoſed, in a council of war, to make an irruption into the Netherlands, and ſo draw the French out of Germany, that they might not have an opportunity of diſturbing the king of Pruſſia, while their own territories were in danger of being invaded. General Imhoff, a Hanoverian officer, attacked a party of the enemy, and drove them from a wood; but the prince de Soubiſe had made himſelf maſter of the important town of Gottingen, by which prince Ferdinand, whoſe army had ſuffered much by the overflowing of the Rhine, was in danger of having his forces divided. Prince Xaverius was ſent with a body of forces to aſſiſt the prince de Soubiſe; while prince Ferdinand, who was perfectly acquainted with the country, diſpatched general Oberg, with ten thouſand men, to join a detachment of Heſſians who were on their march to aſſiſt the allied army; for the French had acted in ſuch an inſincere manner with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, that he had determined not to have any farther connections with them. Both armies continued on the defenſive, as if their ſole intention had been to watch the motions of each other; but on the tenth of October, about four in the afternoon, a ſevere cannonading began; and notwithſtanding the allies, for ſome time, ſeemed to gain the advantage, yet they were at laſt obliged to give way, but retreated in good order. General Oberg loſt his magazine of proviſion and ammunition; but prince Ferdinand having been joined by a body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, who died ſoon after, the French reaped but little benefit from the victory.

In the beginning of this year the king of Pruſſia beſieged the town of Schweidnitz, and carried on the attack with ſuch vigour, that the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. He likewiſe detached a ſtrong party who took the town of Trawtenaw, by which a paſſage was opened for his troops to march into Bohemia or Moldavia. Accordingly, he marched to the city of Olmutz, the capital of the latter, in which was a ſtrong garriſon; but the king beſieged it in form.

Count Daun, who knew the importance of the place, marched to its relief; and meeting with a large convoy of proviſions, he ſeized the whole, by which the king of Pruſſia was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. His ſuperior knowledge and preſence of mind enabled him to make an exceeding good retreat; and although count Daun watched all his motions, yet he was afraid to attack him; and marſhal Keith brought off all the heavy artillery. The Auſtrian detached parties gave way as faſt as he approached, one of them was ſurrounded and taken; and the king, who ſeemed to riſe ſuperior to misfortune, reſolved to transfer the ſeat of war to Bohemia.

The empreſs of Ruſſia entered into a new confederacy with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, and in conſequence thereof her army was ordered to take the field, under the generals Fermor and Brown. Koningſberg, the capital of Pruſſia, was taken without any reſiſtance; and the Coſſacks and Calmacks, a ſet of inhuman barbarians who followed the army, ravaged the neighbouring country, murdering the people without diſtinction of age or ſex.

The Pruſſian general Dohna, watched their motions; but no ſooner had the king heard that they were approaching towards the frontiers of Sileſia, than he began his march from Bohemia, in order to give them battle. The Ruſſians had now advanced to the neighbourhood of Frankfort; and on the ninth of Auguſt the king arrived at Landſhut, where he croſſed the Oder, and next day the army were allowed to reſt. The Pruſſian monarch reſolved to attack them immediately, and for that purpoſe marched paſt their left flank, and drew up his army in order of battle in an extended plain, for the Ruſſians were in poſſeſſion of the riſing grounds.

This brought on a moſt bloody engagement, in which above twenty thouſand Ruſſians were killed, till at laſt night parted them, and the Pruſſians continued under arms. Next morning the battle began afreſh; for the Ruſſians were ſo numerous that they remained in an immoveable ſtate, notwithſtanding their loſs. The victory was claimed by both ſides, although neither had obtained one; but both behaved with the moſt undaunted courage. Beſet, as the king was, with enemies on every ſide, he ſtill continued to act with vigour; and finding that count Daun intended to attack his brother, prince Henry, he marched to his aſſiſtance with twenty-four battalions, and arrived at Torgau on the fifth of September. Several ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties on both ſides; and the king, whoſe army had been much weakened, was obliged to remain on the defenſive. Count Daun, who always acted in the moſt cautious manner, found that the Pruſſians had neglected to fortify the village of Hochkirchin, he began his march in the middle of the night of the fourteenth of October, and attacked that wing of the Pruſſian army which was under the command of marſhal Keith.

This was an unexpected ſtroke, and although the Pruſſians did every thing in their power to repair the loſs, yet they were, after a moſt obſtinate engagement, forced to give way; and the brave marſhal Keith, with prince Francis of Brunſwick, were killed, and the prince of Anhalt taken priſoner. The king loſt above three thouſand men; but he retreated in good order, and continued ten days endeavouring to bring the count to a freſh engagement. Of all the generals during the war count Daun ſeems to have been the moſt properly qualified for making uſe of detached parties, and harraſſing an enemy in a retreat. Whenever he found that the king had decamped, he was ſure to haraſs his rear.

Prince Henry of Pruſſia was reduced to great ſtraits in Saxony, while the marſhal Laudohn was ſent to haraſs the king in Luſatia. Dreſden was the great object the Auſtrians had in view, becauſe in conſequence of its being taken from the Pruſſians an opening would be made into Brandenburgh. This they knew would diſtreſs the king more than any thing they could undertake; but it was not to be executed ſo eaſily as they imagined.

Count Schmettau, who commanded in Dreſden, declared that if the Auſtrians ſhould attack the city, he would reduce the whole to a heap of aſhes; and although the magiſtrates begged on their knees that he would deſiſt from ſuch a meaſure, yet he remained inflexible, and actually laid combuſtibles into the houſes. He began with the ſuburbs, where moſt of the Saxon nobility and gentry reſided, and in a few hours the whole was in one continued blaze. Count Daun beheld, with aſtoniſhment, the conflagration, and being afraid that the general would ſerve the interior part of the city in the ſame manner, he deſiſted, in ſome meaſure; while the king of Pruſſian relieved the town of Neiſs, and then reſolved to return to Saxony. This obliged count Daun to retire towards Bohemia; and the Ruſſians, who had penetrated into Pruſſian Pomerania, in order to beſiege ſome fort that would afford them winter quarters, were obliged to return to Poland. They did not, however, fail to ruin Ducal Pruſſia, where they robbed and murdered the inhabitants in the moſt horrid manner, ſo that the whole country was a ſcene of blood and miſery.

The Britiſh navy during the whole courſe of this year, had been very ſucceſsful both in America and Europe. Captain Forreſt, with the captains Langdon and Suckling, attacked a French ſquadron at Cape François, and diſabled ſeveral of them; after which he proceeded to the bay of Hiſpaniola, and in his way thither took a ſquadron of nine ſhips, all richly laden, which greatly diſtreſſed the French, and brought a conſiderable ſum of money into the nation. Admiral Boſcawen ſailed from Portſmouth in the month of February for the North American ſeas, and Sir Edward Hawke was ſent to the bay of Biſcay. On the coaſt of Spain, admiral Oſborn, aſſiſted by captain Gardiner, a brave officer, attacked a French fleet of the largeſt ſhips of war, and took two of the largeſt belonging to their whole navy. Sir Edward Hawke intercepted a large fleet laden with ſtores and proviſions for North America; and in a few days after, he took a fleet of their merchant ſhips, by which their commerce was greatly diſtreſſed. Theſe ſucceſſes were of ſo rapid a nature, that the people began to look upon their naval officers as the ornaments of their country, and to place the utmoſt confidence in them.

On the ſixth of June a deſcent was made on the coaſt of France by the duke of Marlborough, who commanded the land forces, and he was ſupported by commodore Howe; who, with the great guns on board his ſquadron, kept the French in continual fear. The duke, having deſtroyed the ſhipping at St. Servan, was informed that the enemy were marching to cut off his retreat, was obliged to re-imbark the forces, and then the fleet ſailed towards Havre-de-grace, in order to make a ſecond attempt to land; but the wind blowing from the ſhore, obliged them to ſail towards Cherburg, where the duke attempted to land the forces, but ſtill the wind was againſt them, ſo that they were once more obliged to ſtand out for ſea, till a more favourable opportunity ſhould offer. On the ſecond of Auguſt the fleet weighed anchor a ſecondtime, and ſet ſail for France, under the command of general Bligh and commodore Howe; having on board his royal highneſs prince Edward, afterwards duke of York, who went as a volunteer, it being the deſign of his royal grand-father to bring him up in the knowledge of naval affairs.

The French, who had been ſo often alarmed during this ſummer by the appearance of our fleets on their coaſts, had thrown up an entrenchment on the land ſide of Cherburgh; but the Britiſh forces landed without much oppoſition. The fire of our bomb-ketches ſilenced a ſmall battery which the enemy had erected, while the grenadiers, with the other forces, were enabled to march from the landing-place up to the town; but in their way thither, they were met by a party of the enemy, who attempted to oppoſe them. This, however, they were not able to do, for the Engliſh guards drove them up a hill, where they remained till night, and then made their eſcape. A camp was then formed at the village of Erville near Cherburg, and the next morning the general, finding that the enemy had fled, marched into the important town of Cherburg without the leaſt oppoſition; for the magiſtrates had ordered the gates to be ſet open. A manifeſto was ordered to be ſtuck up in every public place, promiſing protection to all thoſe who ſhould not be found in arms; and the people in general behaved with great decency to the ſoldiers; who, in return, uſed them much better than in common on ſuch occaſions.

The French had laid out great ſums of money in making a baſon for the ſhipping; and although not finiſhed, was looked upon as one of the greateſt curioſities in Europe, and would have been of the utmoſt importance to the French navy. This baſon the general cauſed to be deſtroyed; and while the engineers were employed in blowing it up, the light horſe ſcoured the adjacent country to the diſtance of four miles, where they found that the enemy were daily encreaſing in numbers. Some of the advanced parties continued to ſkirmiſh with each other, but few of our men were killed, only that captain Lindſay, a brave young officer, was mortally wounded, and died ſoon after. All the ſtores in the town were put on board our fleet, three thouſand pounds in money was exacted of the inhabitants, and the general ordered that the troops ſhould be re-imbarked; having firſt thrown up a trench to defend ſuch as embarked laſt, in caſe they ſhould be attacked by the enemy. The fleet returned to the coaſt of England, and again ſet ſail for the coaſt of France, where they took above twenty ſhips, and deſtroyed ſuch batteries and magazines as they found erected along the ſhore.

St. Malo, a ſtrong town on the French ſhore, and extremely popular, was next attacked, on one ſide by our troops, and from the ſea by our ſhips of war; but the weather proving tempeſtuous, they were obliged to deſiſt, and come to an anchor in St. Cas bay. There the general landed his troops, in order to ſpread an alarm among the people, that the French king might be obliged to recal his forces from Germany. Undoubtedly the ſcheme was well planned; but the events of war are uncertain. A camp had been marked out by captain Clarke, the quarter-maſter general; but on the eighth of September the army began to march, and in the evening halted near the river Equernon.

In the mean time the enemy, who had poſted ſome regulars and militia on the oppoſite banks of the river, were ſo much intimidated that they retreated; and the Britiſh army having croſſed the river, continued their march to Martignon, a ſmall village, where they diſcovered a detached body of the enemy, who retired and ſpread the alarm among the people. One ſmall party attempted to haraſs the flank of our army, but finding it impracticable, they made a ſignal to ſurrender; but the Britiſh forces, miſtaking their meaning, fired and killed an officer with ſome of the men.

The ſecond regiment of foot guards was ſent to bring up the proviſions, and colonel Cunningham, the chief engineer, was ordered to ſecure the beach, leſt there ſhould be a neceſſity for a retreat. The general now learned that ſome regiments had left the garriſon of Breſt, and were marching to oppoſe him; as he did not know but others might be ſent to aſſiſt them, he ſent notice to lord Howe, who commanded the fleet, to have the tranſports ready for the re-imbarkation of the troops.

The army, conſiſting of ſix thouſand five hundred men, began to march on the eleventh, in one column, and were drawn up in ſuch a manner as to be able to attack the enemy on any ſide. But after two-thirds of the army was embarked, the enemy's horſe appeared in ſight, on a riſing ground; and about noon they were joined by a large body of foot, collected from different garriſons. The Engliſh veſſels fired upon them; while the French erected a battery, which they played with ſuch fury upon the remainder of the troops that were embarking, that ſeveral of them, particularly the guards, were killed.

General Drury, with twelve hundred men, drew up on the beach, near the village of St. Cas, while the enemy, to avoid the fire from our ſhips, marched into a hollow way that covered them; and there the Engliſh foot prepared to attack them. A propoſal had been made to the general, to cover the beach with an entrenchment; but it was done in an improper place, and he diſcovered his error when it was too late. General Drury, who exerted himſelf to the utmoſt, drove the enemy twice back; but as they were continually receiving freſh reinforcements, he was obliged to retreat, and march towards the boats. The French batteries played upon their rear, and ſome of their bombs deſtroyed ſeveral of the boats, while the Engliſh ſhips could not fire, leſt they ſhould have deſtroyed ſome of our men. General Drury, with ſome other officers, were killed, and ſeveral were drowned in attempting to get into the boats. Commodore Howe, who had ſucceeded to the title of lord in conſequence of the death of his brother, behaved with great bravery on this fatal occaſion, for he expoſed himſelf to the fire of the enemy, and by his example animated the private men. Notwithſtanding this ſcheme miſcarried in its execution, yet other advantages were obtained that ſerved to counterbalance it.

One Mr. Cumming, a quaker, who had been ſeveral voyages to the coaſt of Africa, made himſelf acquainted with every thing worth notice; and being a man of great abilities and deep penetration, obſerved the extenſive trade carried on by the French, and made himſelf acquainted with the Mooriſh king of Legibelli, whoſe dominions lay along the coaſt where the greateſt part of the trade was carried on. Gum Senega, an article much uſed in the manufactures of Great Britain, had been many years wholly engroſſed by the French; who ſold it to the Dutch, and they to us, at a moſt exorbitant price. But this was not all; for Mr. Cumming took notice that many other valuable articles and branches of trade were carried on, ſuch as elephants teeth, gold duſt, cotton, ambergreaſe, and ſeveral others, all of which were of the utmoſt importance to Great Britain, and might, if conducted with ſpirit, become a real national good.

Mr. Cumming loſt no time in making himſelf acquainted with every thing worthy of notice, and ingratiated himſelf ſo far into the good graces of the prince, that he made him a friend to the Engliſh, and promiſed him great advantages in conſequence of trading with them. But what contributed moſt towards promoting the deſign, was the conduct of the French, who had exaſperated the prince againſt them; and he was extremely deſirous to have them driven from the river Senegal, where moſt of their territories had been eſtabliſhed. He deſired that the king of Great Britain would ſend a few ſhips of war for that purpoſe; promiſing, at the ſame time, to aſſiſt them with what land forces he could raiſe.

The difficulties that Mr. Cumming had to engage with were great indeed; but the love he had for his country, made every thing ſeem trifling. The miniſtry conſidered the whole as a Don Quixote like ſcheme, that would be attended with great loſs without any ſolid advantages ariſing from it; but Mr. Cumming repreſented the practicability and utility of it in ſuch ſtrong colours, that they granted a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips under the command of captain Marſh, with five companies of marines under the command of major Maſon, and a ſmall number of artillery, under the direction of captain Walker; but Mr. Cumming was to ſuperintend the whole.

This ſmall armament ſailed from Portſmouth in March, and put into the Iſland of Teneriffe, in order to procure freſh water. There the ſquadron remained till Mr. Cumming ſailed in the Swan ſloop to Portenderrick, with a letter to the prince written in the Arabic language. In this letter, to which the king of Great Britain had put his ſeal, Mr. Cumming was appointed to act as ambaſſador, and conduct the whole of the Britiſh trade that ſhould be carried on in that country. Upon his arrival, he found the prince of the place engaged in war with one of the neighbouring nations, and that he was then at a very great diſtance. But Amir, the prince's miniſter, ſent word to his ſovereign that Mr. Cumming was arrived, and that he could raiſe three hundred men to aſſiſt him, upon condition of their being properly reinforced from the chief army. This would have diſconcerted perſons of leſs fortitude than Mr. Cumming; but the greater the difficulties he had to encounter with, the more active was he in endeavouring to ſurmount them. Having ſent notice to captain Marſh to proceed on his voyage, that brave officer weighed anchor, and got to the mouth of the river Senegal, where he learned that the Indian forces promiſed him were not ſo much as raiſed. Next day he took a large Dutch ſhip laden with gum, and the captain told him, that the French had erected ſeveral batteries along the ſide of the river, and that they were determined to diſpute the paſſage with the Engliſh. This, however, no way intimidated the captain; who made the proper preparations for landing, although the enemy kept firing upon them. This brought on a general engagement, which laſted ſeveral hours; and two of the Engliſh tranſports running aground, the marines got on ſhore, where they were joined by thoſe who had landed before them. They threw up an intrenchment to protect them from the fire of the enemy, till ſuch time as they could get the ſtores landed.

Next day two deputies from the French governor arrived, and offered terms of capitulation; upon which it was agreed, that all the Europeans belonging to the French ſhould be ſafely conducted to France in an Engliſh veſſel, and that none of their private property ſhould be taken from them; that every thing of a public nature ſhould be delivered up to the Engliſh; and that the inhabitants, who chuſed to remain in Fort Louis, ſhould be under the protection of the Engliſh government.

Theſe terms being agreed on, captain Walker and captain Campbell were ſent up the river to take poſſeſſion of the forts; but when they came to the firſt place appointed for their landing, the enemy neither took notice of them, nor hung out the flag of truce. This ſurprized them much; and as they did not know what their intention might be, they ſailed back to the ſquadron, and then went on ſhore to their entrenchments. There they were informed that the negroes were in arms at Fort Louis, becauſe they had not been included in the treaty, and the governor refuſed to abide by the capitulation, unleſs the director-general of the French factory ſhould be permitted to remain, to ſee that every thing was executed according to agreement. This requeſt was immediately complied with, and then the fort was delivered up to major Maſon, who found in it great quantities of merchandiſe, beſides proviſions and military ſtores. The inhabitants of the place chearfully ſwore allegiance to the king of Britain. The prince Legibelli ſent an ambaſſador from his camp to congratulate Mr. Cumming on his ſucceſs, and all the neighbouring princes entered into treaties with him. In the whole of this important expedition, the Engliſh did not loſe a ſingle man, and, by prudence and courage, obtained poſſeſſion of a very valuable place.

Mr. Cumming knew that the valuable ſettlement at Fort Louis could not be maintained by the Engliſh, unleſs they were in poſſeſſion of Goree, about one hundred miles diſtant, where the French had large magazines, and where they kept all their ſlaves before they ſent them to the Weſt-Indies. An attempt was made upon it, but the Engliſh had not force ſufficient to take it. News having been tranſmitted to England, commodore Keppel was ſent with ſix ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tranſports, with ſeven hundred land forces on board. On the twenty-eighth of December, they came to an anchor off Goree, and next morning prepared to attack the place. The French, who had erected batteries along the ſhore, played briſkly upon our men of war, particularly the Prince Edward, which had her main bowſprit ſhot away, but the Naſſau made up to her aſſiſtance. The commodore, who was in the Torbay, paid the utmoſt attention to every thing; and ſo terrible was the fire from his ſhip, that the whole ſeemed one continued blaze.

Many thouſands of negroes came down to ſee the engagement, and were filled with ſurprize at the bravery of the Engliſh ſeamen, whoſe courage increaſed with their danger. The fire from the Engliſh ſhips ſoon obliged the governor to ſtrike the flag; and then a lieutenant, with the commodore's ſecretary, were ſent on ſhore, where they were met by the governor's ſecretary, who aſked them what terms the commodore was willing to grant. This ſurpriſed them, becauſe they imagined that the garriſon were ready to ſurrender priſoners of war; and then they aſked him, whether the flag was not ſtruck? He anſwered, that it was not, but only for a parley; upon which they parted in diſguſt. The engagement was begun again with greater fury than ever; but in leſs than an hour, the governor, as a ſignal to ſurrender, dropped the flag and the regimental colours, and then a party of marines took poſſeſſion of the iſland.

Things of great importance were, at this time, carrying on in America. In May, general Amherſt, with a body of troops, and general Boſcawen, ſailed from Halifax in Nova Scotia; and on the ſecond of June, landed about ſeven miles weſt of Louiſbourg, in the iſland of Cape Breton. The French had taken great care to fortify the place in the ſtrongeſt manner, and the mouth of the harbour had batteries erected at it. The garriſon was numerous, and a chain of forts had been erected along the coaſt, where it was expected the Engliſh would land.

General Wolfe, the ſecond in command, in order to give them an example to imitate, leaped into the water, and got firſt on ſhore. He then attacked, and drove the French from one of their batteries: upon which Mr. Drucour ordered in his detached parties, and prepared to make the moſt vigorous defence. The Engliſh land forces, under the command of general Wolfe, took poſſeſſion of that part of the harbour, near its entrance, called the Light-houſe Point; while the admiral ſet fire to ſome ſhips in the harbour, and burnt two of them to the water-edge. The enemy had only two ſhips of the line and a frigate now remaining, and theſe were taken in a few days; ſo that the harbour being thus laid open, the ſiege was begun, and carried on in the moſt regular manner. It was impoſſible for the governor to hold out againſt the combined force of the army and navy; ſo that he reſolved to capitulate, and the whole garriſon were made priſoners of war. The whole loſs of the Engliſh amounted to about four hundred; and thus, by the utmoſt efforts of courage, the whole iſland of Cape Breton became ſubject to the Engliſh. In Louiſbourg our army found a vaſt quantity of military ſtores; and ſuch of the inhabitants as did not chuſe to live under the Engliſh government, were ſent over to France, but the priſoners were tranſported to England. The iſland of St. John, in the gulph of St. Laurence, was taken, about the ſame time, by lord Rollo, and in the governor's houſe were found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſhmen who had been murdered by the Indians.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the joy that filled the nation upon the arrival of the news of this important event: it gave inexpreſſible pleaſure to all ranks of people; and eleven pair of French colours that had been taken were brought to his majeſty at Kenſington, who ordered them to be eſcorted, under a ſtrong guard, to the cathedral of St. Paul, where they were hung up as trophies of the victory.

Captain Tyrrel, in the Buckingham man of war, was ſent to protect our commerce in the Weſt-Indies; and in the bay of Martinico he demoliſhed a French fort, with ſeveral merchant ſhips that had on board very valuable cargoes, and a conſiderable number of privateers. Captain Tyrrel was ſeldom diſengaged from action, and few men in his ſtation ever acquired greater honour. Happening to fall in with the Weaſel ſloop of war, commanded by lieutenant Bowles, between Montſerrat and Guadalupe, they diſcovered a fleet of nineteen veſſels, under the convoy of a man of war named the Floriſſant, and two large frigates. But, notwithſtanding ſuperiority of numbers, Tyrrel, who was a ſtranger to fear, immediately hoiſted ſail, and gave chace. The two frigates were ſoon rendered unfit for action: upon which captain Tyrrel attacked the man of war, and poured a whole broadſide into her. A moſt deſperate and bloody engagement enſued, in which captain Tyrrel loſt three of his fingers, and was otherwiſe ſo much wounded, that he was obliged to give up the command to Mr. Marſhal, his firſt lieutenant, who fought bravely till he was killed; and then the command devolved upon the ſecond lieutenant, who fought ſo deſperately, that the Floriſſant was obliged to ſtrike; but the ſea running high before the Buckingham could board her, ſhe again hoiſted her colours, and made her eſcape. This was reckoned one of the moſt glorious actions during the war, and will ever redound to the honour of Tyrrel, who loſt only twenty men, while the French loſt one hundred and eighty, beſides above three hundred wounded; ſo that it was with the utmoſt difficulty that they could keep the ſhip above water till they got into the harbour of Martinico.

Things had not been, during this year, ſo ſucceſsfully carried on in the Eaſt-Indies, though no blame could be thrown upon our commanders, who exerted themſelves to the utmoſt. Admiral Pocock being joined by commodore Stephens, with ſeveral ſhips of the line, they ſet ſail from the bay of Madraſs, in order to intercept the French fleet, which they expected to come up with near the bay of St. David's.

On the twenty-ninth of March, the admiral came up with the French fleet, conſiſting of nine ſhips of the line, and reſolved to give them battle. The engagement laſted ſeveral hours; and about five in the evening, the French admiral got before the wind, and the Engliſh admiral gave the ſignal for a general chace; but night coming on, he was obliged to deſiſt. In the morning the purſuit was continued; but ſeveral of the ſhips were ſo much diſabled, and the wind was ſo much in favour of the French, that the Engliſh were obliged to come to an anchor in the bay of Madraſs. There he learned that one of the French ſhips had been ſo much damaged, that they had been obliged to run her a-ground; and that they had not been able to land any forces at St. David's. Three of the Engliſh captains, who had not been active enough in obeying the admiral's ſignals, were tried by a court-martial, and broke; for it was in conſequence of their conduct that the French fleet eſcaped, which otherwiſe would have been totally deſtroyed.

The next object the admiral had in view was the reduction of Pondicherry: and having repaired his ſhips, he ſet ſail for that place on the tenth of May. He arrived in the bay oppoſite to that fort on the thirtieth of May, where he got ſight of the French fleet, but could not come up with them; which obliged him to return to Madraſs, in order to conſult on the moſt proper methods to be uſed, and likewiſe to get a ſupply of freſh proviſions, of which the fleet was in great want.

Having conſulted with the governor, and got every thing ready, the admiral weighed anchor on the twenty-fifth of July, and in two days got ſight of the French fleet, conſiſting of eight ſhips and a frigate. They were ſteering towards Pondicherry; and admiral Pocock made the ſignal for a general chace, but could not come up with them till the third of Auguſt, when a general engagement enſued. The French admiral found it impoſſible to reſiſt the bravery of the Engliſh; and therefore, in a few minutes, he gave way, while the Engliſh purſued till night, when they were parted, and by that means the French got into the road of Pondicherry. In this engagement the Engliſh had a conſiderable number wounded, among whom were commodore Stephens and captain Martin; but they had not above forty killed.

On the fourteenth of September, colonel Draper, on board the company's ſhip Pitt, arrived at Madraſs, having under his command ſome companies of his own regiment: and in the beginning of December, the French forces encamped near a place called Choultry. The Engliſh cannonaded them a whole day, and next morning they ſeemed as if going to draw up in order of battle. Colonel Draper, with colonel Lawrence, being afraid that they might cut off their retreat, took poſſeſſion of the Black Town, and the French marched up to attack it; but one of their regiments was ſurpriſed by colonel Draper, and almoſt cut off. Had the colonel been properly ſupported, he would, in all probability, have defeated the enemy; but his numbers were ſo ſmall, that he was obliged to retreat.

The parliament of Great-Britain met on the twenty-third day of November, and was opened by a commiſſion from his majeſty. The lord-keeper informed them, that his majeſty had ordered the lords commiſſioners to lay before them all papers relating to the ſtate of the nation: that the great ſucceſs which had attended his majeſty's arms, both by ſea and land, could not fail of reducing the enemy to ſuch diſtreſs, that they would be ready to propoſe terms of peace. He added, that his good brother, the king of Pruſſia, had exerted himſelf to the utmoſt, altho' oppoſed by very numerous armies. He ſincerely lamented, that the ſtate of public affairs had laid ſuch burthens on his people; but he doubted not that his faithful commons would conſider ſuch burthens as abſolutely neceſſary, in order to ſupport the dignity of the crown and the intereſt of the nation. He concluded by telling them, that he was ſo well convinced of their affection, both to his perſon and government, that he thought it altogether needleſs to uſe many words to perſuade them, and therefore left the whole to their own diſcretion. No diſputes aroſe concerning the ſpeech, for both houſes preſented the moſt loyal addreſſes, and both ſeemed to ſtrive which ſhould be moſt forward in ſhewing their regard for their country.

A. D. 1759. This year opened with a proclamation, offering an additional bounty to ſuch ſeamen as were willing to enter into his majeſty's ſervice; and the conduct of adminiſtration, in this inſtance, was followed by moſt of the cities and towns in the nation. All parties were reconciled, and patriotiſm diffuſed itſelf throughout every part of the kingdom. The miniſtry planned their ſchemes with ſuch judgment, as will ever do honour to their ſuperior abilities; and our forces, both by land and ſea, even performed wonders. The French navy was now reduced ſo much, that they reſolved upon making one bold puſh; but as their whole finances were exhauſted, they were obliged to oppreſs the ſubjects in the moſt cruel manner. Great preparations were made by them along the coaſts of Normandy and Britany; forces were collected together, and ſeveral new ſhips were built. There was not the leaſt doubt but they intended to invade England, for they had provided a great number of flat bottomed boats at Havre de Grace, and ſome other ports. A ſmall ſquadron was to be fitted out at Dunkirk, and the command given to Mr. Thurot, a perſon of obſcure birth, but poſſeſſed of ſuch abilities as would have done honour to the higheſt ſtation in the navy. It was ſuppoſed that this ſquadron was intended for making a deſcent on Scotland; but every thing was conducted with ſuch ſecrecy, that the public were left merely to conjecture. Another ſquadron was to make a deſcent on Ireland; and the whole was to be eſcorted by M. de Conflans, who, with the duke de Aiguillon, was then at Breſt, giving the neceſſary orders. The Engliſh miniſtry, who attended to the intereſts of the nation with the greateſt integrity, took care to be beforehand with them. A ſquadron, under commodore Boys, was ordered to lie oppoſite the harbour of Dunkirk: the fleet in Breſt was blocked up by admiral Hawke; and captain Duff watched Vannes, another of their ports: ſo that it ſeemed almoſt impoſſible for them to get their ſhips out of their harbours.

On the ſecond of July, admiral Rodney came to an anchor before Havre de Grace, in order to prevent the flat-bottomed boats from joining the fleet, and ſo fruſtrate the whole ſcheme. Next day he attacked the town with two veſſels, and threw ſuch a number of bombs into it, that moſt of the magazines were deſtroyed. The bombardment continued fifty hours without intermiſſion, and was ſo dreadful that the town was three times ſet on fire. The flat-bottomed boats were likewiſe ſet on fire, and continued burning ſix hours; ſo that it took ſeveral hundred men to extinguiſh it.

The conſternation of the inhabitants was greater than can be imagined, many of them forſook their dwellings, while the military continued erecting batteries, and throwing up entrenchments; for they imagined that the admiral intended to land. The conduct of the admiral on this occaſion ſtruck ſuch terror into the French miniſtry, that they became divided in their councils; for they found it almoſt impoſſible that ever they could make a deſcent on England, while our navy did their duty.

In the mean time, the brave admiral Boſcawen was ſent into the Mediterranean, to block up the harbour of Toulon, where the French had a fleet under the command of M. de la Clue. Three Engliſh men of war were ſent to burn two of the French ſhips that guarded the mouth of the harbour; but a calm coming on, the enemy took the advantage, and fired ſo briſkly, that the Engliſh veſſels were greatly damaged, and the admiral was obliged to return to Gibraltar. The French ſeized that opportunity of getting out of the harbour, thinking to get through the gut of Gibraltar without being ſeen by the Engliſh. Admiral Boſcawen ordered one of his ſhips to cruize, and to keep a good look out, that he might have timely notice of their arrival. Accordingly, on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, the cruizing veſſels brought notice to the admiral, that the French fleet were ſteering along the coaſt of Barbary, ſeeming as if they intended to paſs the gut, and ſo get into the ocean. The whole fleet were immediately ordered to weigh anchor, and get under ſail; and next day, about two in the afternoon, they came up with the French, but it was ſome time longer before they could engage, becauſe of the wind dying away. The Engliſh admiral came up with M. de la Clue, in a large French firſt-rate called the Ocean, about four in the afternoon, and the engagement began in the moſt furious manner; the French, according to their uſual cuſtom, aiming all their fire at the ſails and rigging. By this method of fighting, the Namur, admiral Boſcawen's ſhip, was ſo much damaged, that he was obliged to hoiſt his flag on board the Newark; and ſoon after the Centaur, a ſhip of ſeventy-four guns, ſtruck to the Engliſh.

The French admiral ſtood in for the land, which admiral Boſcawen ſeeing, ordered the America and Intrepid to go and deſtroy his ſhip; but the French admiral ſaved them the trouble: for having one of his legs broke, he got on ſhore, and then the ſhip ſtruck. Admiral Boſcawen ordered her, as ſhe was little better than a wreck, to be ſet on fire; while he burnt another, and two were brought off with very little damage; ſo that the Engliſh obtained this important victory with the loſs of only fifty-ſix men.

This was a moſt fatal blow to the French, for beſides the loſs of four capital ſhips, their two fleets were prevented from joining; but ſtill they carried on their preparations at Breſt, like broken gameſters, who, when they have borrowed a trifle, will venture all upon it. A large body of land forces, with the Iriſh brigades, were kept in readineſs in order to embark on board the tranſports; and a train of artillery was to be ſent along with them. Thurot had made his eſcape out of the harbour of Dunkirk, in order to ſail round the coaſt of Scotland, to divide our fleet, by obliging ſome of them to ſail that way; but all their projects were defeated by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke.

That brave admiral continued to block up the harbour of Breſt, with a fleet of twenty-three ſhips of the line; while another ſquadron under the command of commodore Duff, cruized along the coaſt to keep the people in continual alarm, and to prevent any of their privateers putting out to ſea. The French miniſtry were out of all patience, becauſe of their fleet in Breſt lying inactive; and therefore in the month of November, poſitive orders were ſent to M. de Conflans to make an attempt to get out.

A great ſtorm ariſing on the coaſt, the Engliſh fleet were driven out to ſea, and on the tenth of November they came to an anchor in Torbay road. This gave the French admiral an opportunity of making out of the harbour, his deſign being to attack and deſtroy the ſmall ſquadron under the command of commodore Duff, and ſo prevent his junction with the grand fleet. In the mean time, the weather being more favourable, Sir Edward Hawke ſet ſail for his former ſtation, and diſpatched the Coventry and Maidſtone frigates a-head of the ſquadron to give proper ſignals of the approach of the enemy. About ten in the morning of the twentieth of November the Maidſtone gave the ſignal, upon which Sir Edward ordered all the ſhips to draw near and form a-breaſt. The enemy were juſt at that inſtant in purſuit of Duff's ſquadron; but ſeeing the Engliſh fleet, they hoiſted all the ſail they could, by which Duff had an opportunity of joining the admiral. Sir Edward ordered ſeven of the ſhips to give them chace; and, in the mean time, that no opportunity ſhould be loſt, he bore down upon them with the reſt of the fleet, keeping all the ſhips formed in the line of battle.

Future ages will read, with admiration, the conduct of the Engliſh admiral on this memorable occaſion. The coaſt was full of rocks and ſhallows, the wind was blowing towards the ſhore; he had few pilots to give him proper directions, and the enemy had a great number of land forces on board. But no fear of danger could make him neglect that duty he owed to his country; he knew that our enemies were forming ſchemes to make the Britiſh as abject ſlaves as themſelves; and therefore he was determined either to conquer or periſh in the attempt. The two fleets came up together near the iſland of Belliſle, about half an hour after two in the afternoon, and the engagement began between the van of the Engliſh and the rear of the French. The admiral in the mean time continued in purſuit of the van, and came up with the French admiral's ſhip into which he poured a broad-ſide. A large French ſhip named the Theſee, came up to the aſſiſtance of admiral Conflans ſhip the Soliel; but the Royal George, on board of which was admiral Hawke, ſunk her in an inſtant, and every perſon on board periſhed, affording a moſt ſhocking ſpectacle to thoſe who ſaw it.

The weather was very tempeſtuous, notwithſtanding which the battle was carried on with great fury; The Superb, a large French ſhip, was ſunk ſoon after the Theſee, and the Formidable ſtruck her colours. The Heros, another of the French ſhips, ſubmitted, and came to an anchor about four in the afternoon; but the ſea continued running ſo high, that the boats could not get up to man her. The night coming on, the ſhattered remains of the French fleet made their eſcape, except the Soliel, in which was the admiral; but when morning came, he diſcovered that he had lain all night at anchor in the midſt of the Engliſh, and therefore ſlipped his cable to make his eſcape. Sir Edward Hawke ordered the Eſſex to purſue her; but unfortunately ſhe happened to ſtick on a ſand bank; ſo that the Vengeance, Portland, and Chatham, were ordered upon the ſame ſervice. The French admiral ſeeing no methods to be uſed in order to ſave his ſhip, got into what boats he had, and then ſet her on fire; while the Engliſh did the ſame to two large ſhips which they had driven upon the ſand banks.

Seven large ſhips of the French ſquadron were ſtill riding at anchor, which the Engliſh admiral ſeeing, ordered the fleet to weigh, but the weather being very tempeſtuous, he was a ſecond time obliged to come to an anchor. The French, ſeeing nothing leſs than immediate deſtruction before them, threw overboard all their ammunition, guns, and ſtores, and then took ſhelter in the mouth of the river Vilaine, where they were protected by ſeveral batteries erected for the purpoſe.

This was one of the moſt important victories ever obtained over the French, during the whole courſe of the war; for it diſconcerted their whole ſcheme laid for the invaſion of England, while their navy was almoſt reduced to a wreck. Nor did the brave Sir Edward Hawke leave the French coaſt till his ſovereign recalled him, in order to confer upon him ſuch honours as his merits entitled him to.

In the mean time the Engliſh were equally ſucceſsful in other parts of the globe; for in the Weſt Indies they took the valuable iſland of Guadaloupe, and the whole exterior parts of Canada on the ſouth of the river St. Laurence were alſo ſubdued.

The next great object of national importance was the reduction of the iſland of Martinico; and for that purpoſe a fleet ſailed from St. Helens under the the command of commodore Hughes, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line, beſides ſeveral frigates and bomb-ketches, with tranſports, having on board ſome land forces, under the command of the generals Hopſon and Barrington. At Barbadoes they were joined by commodore Moore, who took upon him the command of the whole ſquadron; and having provided the fleet with every thing neceſſary for the undertaking, they ſet ſail on the thirteenth of January. On the ſixteenth of the ſame month the attack was made on Fort Negro, about three miles from the capital, and next day the marines landed, in order to drive the enemy from their entrenchments; but on climbing up the rock they found them all gone. Immediately, upon a ſignal given, a body of ſeamen from each ſhip landed, and hoiſted the Engliſh flag upon the parapet; while the Woolwich, Roebuck, and Wincheſter, attacked a fort near the entrance of the harbour. This battery was ſoon ſilenced, and a large magazine blown up, while the three ſhips kept up a conſtant fire, in order to cover the flat-bottomed boats. The ſcheme of landing the marines at one part of the iſland, and the reſt of the forces at another, was of conſiderable advantage; for the enemy being afraid that they ſhould be encloſed between two fires, ſhut themſelves up in Port Royal, the citadel, and ſuffered the Engliſh troops to land without oppoſition.

When general Hopſon had advanced a few miles up the country, he found it impracticable to proceed farther, unleſs the commodore would ſend to his aſſiſtance ſome of the heavy artillery, and at the ſame time attack the fort from the bay. Accordingly he ſent to acquaint the commodore, who immediately landed the heavy artillery, which were drawn up to the general by the ſeamen inſtead of horſes, while the ſquadron came to an anchor. The general called a council of war, to enquire whether it was practicable to attack the fort of Port Royal; but the majority being of a contrary opinion, the forces were re-embarked, with a view of landing at St. Piere; and the fleet, with the tranſports, ſet ſail for that part of the iſland; but the attempt miſcarried, though it ſucceeded ſome time after.

In North America, many of the Engliſh groaned under the moſt cruel oppreſſion; for the French had in the moſt infamous manner, ſtirred up moſt of the Indian nations to deſtroy thoſe who lived on the borders of our ſettlements. The barbarities committed by theſe ſavages were the moſt horrid that could be imagined; and compaſſion for the diſtreſſed induced our miniſtry to employ agents to enter into a treaty with the Indians. For this purpoſe a congreſs was held at Eaſton, near one hundred miles from Philadelphia; wherein it was agreed, that fifteen Indian nations ſhould become the allies of Great Britain, and that they and our army ſhould mutually defend each other.

This was one of the wiſeſt meaſures that could have been thought of; for no ſooner was it concluded, than the Indians agreed to go along with our forces, and attack the French in ſuch of their ſettlements as were not then conquered in Canada. The army, employed in this important ſervice, was divided into three parts; the firſt of which, under the command of general Amherſt, croſſed Lake George, without meeting with any oppoſition.

The firſt place he approached was the important paſs of Ticonderago; but the French abandoned it, and fled towards Canada. General Amherſt ordered ſuch parts of the fortifications as the French had deſtroyed, to be rebuilt, and put the place in a much better condition than ever it had been in before; and there he learned that the French had abandoned Crown Point, ſo that nothing but victory attended the Britiſh arms. The general ſent a party of men to take poſſeſſion of it, and to fortify it in the ſtrongeſt manner; becauſe, in conſequence of doing ſo, the Indians in the French intereſt, would be prevented from coming down in ſcalping parties to commit the moſt horrid barbarities.

A party of French, who had not been able to keep up with the main body, retired to an iſland in Lake Champlain; and as there was reaſon to fear that they would plunder the neighbouring inhabitants on the continent, general Amherſt ordered a ſloop of ſixteen guns to be built, and gave the command thereof to captain Loring; but the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, and the weather ſo very tempeſtuous, he could not proceed on the Lake, and the general returned to Crown Point.

While general Amherſt was at Crown Point he received intelligence that Sir William Johnſon, who commanded a party of Indians, had been joined by general Prideaux, and that they were on their march towards Niagra. There they attacked the French fort; but general Prideaux was unfortunately killed by the burſting of a ſhell, while he was taking a view of the trenches. Sir William Johnſon took the command upon him till the arrival of general Gage, and then the ſiege was carried on with great vigour. The French were ſo much alarmed with the apprehenſion of loſing a fort that would open a new way for the Engliſh, that they ſent a body of twelve hundred regulars, under the command of M. de Aubry, to aſſiſt thoſe that were in the garriſon.

Sir William Johnſon having intelligence that they were approaching the place, reſolved to give them battle; and therefore, leaving a ſmall party to conduct the ſiege, he came up with them near the borders of a wood, and a deſperate engagement enſued. In leſs than an hour, victory declared in favour of the Engliſh, and the French general, with the greateſt part of his men, were killed; for the Indians, who had concealed themſelves in the wood, galled them in the ſevereſt manner. Seventeen officers were taken priſoners, a liſt of which Sir William ſent to the French governor of the fort, requeſting him to ſurrender, as it would be in vain to attempt holding out any longer. The governor, conſcious that he could not defend himſelf much longer, agreed to capitulate; and the articles being drawn, the garriſon were ſuffered to march out with all the honours of war. They were then ſent to Newark, in order to embark for France; and as for the women, with the ſick and wounded, they were treated in the moſt humane and compaſſionate manner.

But the great object ſtill in view by the Engliſh was the complete conqueſt of Canada; for although they had ravaged moſt of the country, yet the towns ſtill held out for the French. It was an attempt of the moſt hazardous nature, but nothing ſeemed too difficult for our troops, who had carried conqueſt before them through every country where they happened to engage.

The fleet deſtined to execute this enterprize, ſailed from Portſmouth in February under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes; but when they had got within ſight of Cape Breton, they were obliged to ſteer away towards Hallifax, the harbour being frozen over. In the mean time, admiral Durell was detached, with a ſmall ſquadron, to the river St. Laurence; there to cruize, and prevent the garriſon of Quebec from receiving ſtores.

Admiral Saunders, having taken in freſh proviſions, and embarked the land forces, ſailed up the river St. Laurence. The commander in chief of the forces was general Wolfe, and under him were the generals Monckton, Townſend, and Murray, young gentlemen of approved abilities, and brought up to all the hardſhips of a military life. About the latter end of June the forces were landed on the iſle of Orleans, a little below Quebec; where the general cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed, intimating, that the king of Great Britain, his ſovereign, had fitted out a fleet and an army to reduce all the French ſettlements in North America; but that no injury ſhould be done to the peaceable inhabitants, who ſhould be allowed the free exerciſe of their religion, and to follow their ſecular employments.

No declaration made by one who came in an hoſtile manner, could be more replete with ſentiments of humanity; but the Romiſh prieſts had ſo prepoſſeſſed the people againſt the Engliſh, that they looked upon our army as a body of heathens devoted to deſtruction. Such of the ſtraggling parties of our forces as happened to leave the main army, were murdered by theſe moſt wretched bigots. Upon which the brave general Wolfe ſent a letter to the French commander, requeſting that he would iſſue orders to the Canadians and Indians to deſiſt from ſuch practices, as were contrary to the laws of war, and a diſgrace to humanity. He added, that unleſs his requeſt was complied with, he ſhould find himſelf under the diſagreeable neceſſity of making repriſals, and treating all thoſe who fell into his hands in the ſame manner as the Britiſh ſubjects had been treated by the Indians. M. de Montcalm, the French general, though a brave ſoldier, yet having received poſitive orders from his court not to ſhew any mercy to the Engliſh, refuſed to return any anſwer to general Wolfe's letter; upon which, contrary to his natural ſentiments of humanity, he was obliged, though very unwillingly, to ſuffer the ſoldiers to commit ſome very irregular actions.

The ſituation of Quebec made it eaſy for the French to fortify it in the ſtrongeſt manner, and the garriſon was well ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſions. At the ſame time, M. de Montcalm had under his command a large body of regulars, ſo that the taking of the place ſeemed next to impoſſible: but the confidence which the general had in his troops, and his martial genius, which ſeemed ſuperior to every thing, induced him to begin the hazardous enterprize, bidding defiance to all dangers, for the ſake of military glory, and the love of his country.

Point Levi, near Quebec, was fortified with a train of artillery; and as the taking of that place was of great importance, general Wolfe ordered general Monckton to advance towards it in the night with four battalions, and next morning it was taken. The Engliſh erected a battery upon it; upon which the French general ſent a body of ſixteen hundred men to diſlodge them, but they fell into ſuch confuſion, that they fired on each other, while the Engliſh played off their artillery with ſo much ſucceſs, that great part of the town was reduced to aſhes.

In the mean time, the Engliſh fleet ſuffered conſiderably, in conſequence of a dreadful ſtorm, which drove the ſhips againſt each other, and ſeveral of the tranſports were daſhed in pieces. The French general, who beheld this diſaſter, ordered ſome fire-ſhips to be ſent in among the Engliſh tranſports; but the Engliſh admiral diſconcerted his ſcheme, by ordering the ſeamen to board them; and then being towed to land, they were all ſet on fire. A ſecond attempt of the like nature was made, but it was attended with the ſame conſequences, for they were burnt like the others. General Wolfe found it neceſſary to make himſelf as well acquainted with the river St. Laurence as poſſible; and therefore colonel Charlton was ordered to land at a place called Point au Tremble, in order to make what diſcoveries he could, and, if poſſible, to bring off ſome priſoners, by which the deſigns of the enemy might be known. Theſe orders the colonel obeyed, while general Townſhend prevented the French from erecting a battery near the mouth of the river Montmorenci, where they intended to cannonade the Engliſh; and this was done by keeping up a continual fire.

The water was too ſhallow for the men of war to come up to the beach; but, to remedy that misfortune, the admiral ordered two tranſports to be got ready, and to be run on ſhore, by which he propoſed taking the advanced redoubt. By ſuch means as theſe, the forces were landed; and the grenadiers were ſo impatient to diſlodge the French from their entrenchments, that they ran on in the moſt irregular manner, without minding the orders they had received. The enemy kept up ſuch a cloſe fire, that the grenadiers were obliged to ſhelter themſelves under the redoubt, which had been abandoned by the French; and the general finding the night coming on, ordered them to retreat to the camp at Montmorenci; while the admiral, who was afraid leſt the two tranſports which had been run aſhore ſhould fall into the hands of the enemy, ordered them to be ſet on fire. The retreat of the grenadiers diſcouraged the general ſo much, eſpecially as five hundred men had been killed, beſides a great number of officers, that he was determined to make one bold effort; and, for that purpoſe, general Murray was ſent to a place called Chambaud, where he burnt a large magazine of proviſions and ammunition belonging to the French. The fatigues which the brave general Wolfe had lately undergone, had ſuch an effect on his conſtitution, that he was forced to keep his bed for ſeveral days; and, in the mean time, deſired the other generals to make the moſt neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking the place, that the diſpute might be finally terminated. It was their opinion, that it would be beſt to land ſuch of the forces as were yet on board, about three miles above the town, and ſo bring on the enemy to a general engagement: but this meaſure being found impracticable, they were landed a little below the town, in the middle of the night: for although ſeveral of them had landed before, yet they had been obliged to re-embark. General Wolfe was one of the firſt that ſet foot on ſhore; and the general diſembarkation was covered and protected by admiral Holmes, who kept hovering on the coaſt while the boats glided along. They had a riſing ground to aſcend, called Mount Abraham, and about the middle of it was a guard of French ſoldiers; but colonel How, with a party of highlanders, drove them from it, and made way for the army to aſcend the hill. The French general had marked out a ſtrong camp, and actually taken poſſeſſion of it; but no ſooner did he learn that the Engliſh had aſcended the hill, than he reſolved to give them battle.

In the mean time, general Wolfe ſeeing that the French were approaching to attack him, ordered the line to be formed, giving the command of the right to general Monckton, and that of the left to general Murray: the center was commanded by himſelf; and about nine in the morning the engagement began. Soon after the firſt or ſecond firings were over, general Wolfe, who was ſtationed in the hotteſt part of the battle, received a wound in his wriſt; but pulling a handkerchief out of his pocket, wrapped it round his hand, and continued to advance at the head of the grenadiers, without the leaſt emotion, as if inſenſible of any thing but his duty.

The French met the Engliſh grenadiers with great fury. General Wolfe, in puſhing forward, received a mortal wound in his breaſt, and, like Epaminondas, loſt his valuable life at a time when victory had declared for him. The critical moment was now arrived; for the general being killed, no time was to be loſt, leſt the troops ſhould have been diſpirited: and general Townſhend being the next in command, haſtened to the center, where he ſoon found that a party of two thouſand French were on the point of attacking him in the rear. Theſe, however, were afraid to advance, thinking it more prudent to retire among the woods.

The French now gave way, after above eight hundred had been killed; and M. de Montcalm finding himſelf mortally wounded, juſt before he died, wrote a letter to general Townſhend, recommending to his humanity and compaſſion the poor priſoners and the wounded. The next in command under him ſhared the ſame fate; for being mortally wounded, he was carried on board one of our ſhips of war, but expired within a few hours after.

The brave general Wolfe, of whom the nation had formed the greateſt hopes, expired ſoon after the victory. Being told of the ſucceſs of his forces, he ſaid to thoſe who attended him, "Then (thank God) "I die contented." To do juſtice to all ranks of people, it muſt be acknowledged that the loſs of this brave officer was ſincerely lamented. He was only in his thirty-ſecond year, but crowned with military glory in ſuch a manner, that his name will be tranſmitted to poſterity with honour; while other young gentlemen, in ſucceeding ages, will be ſtimulated to emulate ſo ſhining a character. A noble monument has been erected for him in Weſtminſter-abbey. But his actions will immortalize his name, when the moſt ſolid marble ſhall have crumbled into duſt.

The generals and admirals being now in poſſeſſion of every thing but the town, they thought it more prudent to accept of propoſals to capitulate than to undergo the hardſhips of a ſiege; ſo that the garriſon were ſuffered to march out with all the honours of war. By the articles of capitulation it was granted, that the people ſhould enjoy the free uſe and exerciſe of the Romiſh religion, and all epiſcopal offices, in the ſame manner as when under the French government, till ſuch time as the war was over; and that they ſhould be treated in the ſame manner as if they had been originally ſubjects of Great-Britain. The Engliſh having taken poſſeſſion of the gates, general Townſhend gave the command of the town to general Murray, with a garriſon of five thouſand men; and ſet ſail, with admiral Saunders, for Europe. General Monkton, who had been dangerouſly wounded in the battle, was ſent to New-York, where he happily recovered.

In the Eaſt-Indies, the affairs of the Engliſh began to wear a favourable aſpect: for the admirals Corniſh and Pocock defeated a large ſquadron of men of war, and obliged them to take ſhelter in the iſland of Mauritius, to refit. The Dutch, ever ſelfiſh and mercenary, continued to ſupply the French with proviſions; for they ſeldom pay the leaſt regard to any thing beſides money, the means uſed in procuring it being little attended to. Under pretence that our men of war had given them ſome affront, the Dutch governor of Batavia ordered ſome of our merchantmen to be ſeized; and captain Wilſon, in the Calcutta Indiaman, having demanded ſatisfaction, the Dutch commodore threatened to ſink him if he did not immediately retire. As captain Wilſon knew that it would be very imprudent in him to engage with force ſo ſuperior, he returned to Calcutta, and told colonel Clive in what manner he had been treated. There being two other Eaſt-Indiamen lying there at the ſame time, the colonel ordered them to attack the Dutch commodore. Accordingly a ſmart engagement enſued, in which two of the Dutch ſhips were obliged to bear away, a third was driven on ſhore, and four ſtruck their flags. Colonel Coote, who had been ſent in the beginning of this year from England, carried on the war with very great ſucceſs on the coaſt of Coromandel, where he defeated general Lally, reduced ſeveral ſtrong forts which the French had erected, and concluded the year with honour to himſelf, while the intereſt of the nation was promoted.

In Germany, the war was carried on with various ſucceſs. The king of Pruſſia was ſo ſurrounded by enemies on all hands, that it was imagined he would be ſwallowed up; but perſeverance enabled him to ſurmount every difficulty. Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, who commanded the allied army, had been conſiderably reinforced by freſh troops from England; and on the thirteenth of April, he came within ſight of the French, commanded by marſhal Broglio, at Bergen, a ſmall village in the neighbourhood of Frankfort. No general could have done more than prince Ferdinand in order to procure victory; but ſuch was the ſituation of the French, that although he attacked them three different times, yet he was, in the end, obliged to retreat, but did it in ſuch excellent order, that the French were not able to purſue him. This action was a ſevere ſtroke to the allied army, who were greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; while the French, who had taken the city of Gottingen, enjoyed them in great plenty, and were every day marching farther into the electorate of Hanover, exacting of the inhabitants heavy contributions.

It was now become, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary for the allies to venture on an engagement, otherwiſe the French would have once more made good their winter quarters in Hanover. The French general had made himſelf maſter of the city of Minden, and ordered a camp to be formed in its neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Ferdinand, whoſe army lay encamped at Peterſhagen, acted with ſo much prudence, and diſplayed ſuch military ſkill, that the French could not perceive, from his motions, whether he intended to advance or retreat.

He had received advice, that a large convoy of proviſions was coming from Paderborn for the uſe of the French, and he deſigned, if poſſible, to prevent its joining the army. At the ſame time, he made as if he intended to divide his forces, and this led the French generals into a ſnare. The duke de Broglio marched, in order to attack general Wangenheim; but when he came to the top of an eminence, he was ſurpriſed to ſee the whole of prince Ferdinand's army drawn up in the order of battle.

It was now too late to think of retiring; for on one ſide was the river Weſer, and on the other a deep moraſs, both ſtrongly guarded by the allies; ſo that the French were in great danger of being ſurrounded. The engagement was begun by the French cavalry, who came upon the Engliſh infantry with great fury. Nothing could equal the courage of the Engliſh on this occaſion; for although they were only aſſiſted by a ſmall party of the Hanoverian army, yet they cut in pieces two bodies of the French horſe who had repeatedly attempted to break through them. The Engliſh regiments of Walgrave and Kingſley cut in pieces two French battaſions who attempted to ſupport the horſe; upon which the center of the French army being broken, and the reſt beginning to retreat, prince Ferdinand ſent an expreſs order to lord George Sackville, who commanded the Engliſh horſe, to come up at full gallop; but a miſunderſtanding having, for ſome time, ſubſiſted between the prince and lord George, the latter did not come up in time to ſhare in the glory of the victory. Had the Engliſh cavalry come up in time, the French would have been totally routed; but, by this fatal miſunderſtanding, they made good their retreat in tolerable order, the Engliſh not being able to haraſs their rear without the aſſiſtance of the horſe. As the glory of this victory was chiefly owing to the courage and bravery of the Engliſh, ſo the prince did not neglect to acknowledge it, and only regretted that the marquis of Granby had not commanded the horſe.

Great rejoicings were made in England when the news of this important victory arrived: but the ſpirits of the people were damped when they conſidered that the conduct of their own general had prevented it from being deciſive. Lord George Sackville, whoſe conduct expoſed him to great cenſure, left the army, and returned to England, where he was, by his majeſty's orders, ſtripped of all his employments, and the command of the Britiſh forces conferred on the brave marquis of Granby, a young nobleman, who, to the moſt extenſive benevolence, joined the moſt undaunted courage, and was obeyed by the ſoldiers from motives of love rather than fear.

The French were ſo much incenſed at their loſs of this memorable battle, that the marſhal de Belleiſle, who was at the head of the war department, loſt the whole of his reputation, while the duke de Broglio and the marſhal de Contades mutually upbraided each other. Broglio, who had gone to Paris in order to vindicate his own character, took care to repreſent that of M. de Contades in ſuch an odious light, that the latter was recalled, and the former inveſted with the chief command, partly by the intrigues of madam Pompadour, and partly by the antipathy his ſovereign had conceived againſt him.

When Broglio returned to the camp, the ſeaſon was too far advanced for action; but notwithſtanding, he reſolved to attack prince Ferdinand's lines, who was well prepared to receive him. In that, however, he miſcarried, and was obliged to return to his camp, leaving the prince at full liberty to ſecure all his cantonments, while the army went into winter-quarters.

The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, whoſe military glory was now beginning to ſhine in the moſt conſpicuous light, had been detached, at the head of a party, into Saxony, in order to ſecond the operations of the king of Pruſſia, and, during the time he was there, he behaved not only with courage, but alſo diſplayed ſuch conſummate knowledge as ſurpriſed all Europe.

On the fourteenth of November, both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter, by commiſſion, and the lord-keeper informed the members, that his majeſty had called them together in order that all public affairs ſhould be laid before them; that their advice ſhould be taken in every thing of importance; and that they might beſtow ſome marks of their favour on thoſe generals and admirals who, during the ſummer, had diſtinguiſhed themſelves with ſo much honour. He added, that nothing could give him greater pleaſure than to ſee the public tranquillity reſtored; but that he would never make peace on terms which were diſhonourable. He rejoiced to find that his beloved ſubjects lived in harmony under his government; and aſſured the commons, that although great ſums of money had been granted for carrying on the war, yet none of them had been appropriated to private purpoſes, but the whole laid out in the uſes for which they were deſigned. He concluded by recommending to them the general ſtate of Europe, ſo far as the flames of war had been lighted, that all theſe nations had their eyes fixed upon them; and that he doubted not but they would contribute in the moſt liberal manner towards ſupporting the army and navy. Dutiful and loyal addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, and a perfect union took place between the miniſtry and the parliament.

Two of the royal family of Great-Britain died towards the cloſe of this year. The princeſs of Orange, eldeſt daughter to his majeſty king George II. died at the Hague, after a lingering illneſs that had confined her ſome months. She was a lady of extraordinary talents, and, as guardian for her ſon, ſhe ruled with ſpirit and prudence. Beſides the Latin, ſhe was well acquainted with French, Spaniſh, Italian, and Low Dutch, and her leiſure hours were ſpent in the company of learned men; ſo that, in moſt things, the princeſs was a ſtriking image of her royal mother. The other branch of the royal family that paid the debt of nature, was the princeſs Elizabeth, ſecond daughter of his royal highneſs Frederick prince of Wales, a young lady of an engaging aſpect, and the moſt agreeable manners.

A. D. 1760. The firſt thing that engages our attention this year, is the proceedings of parliament, which were in all things ſatisfactory to the miniſtry. Seventy thouſand men were allowed for the ſervice of the royal navy, and three millions, ſix hundred and forty thouſand pounds, were granted for maintaining them. It is unneceſſary to mention all the particulars which were taken into conſideration during this ſeſſion of parliament; but certain it is, nothing was aſked by the miniſtry that the commons refuſed. They granted a ſupply of fifteen millions, three thouſand five hundred and ſixty-three pounds, fifteen ſhillings and nine-pence halfpenny; more than could have been raiſed by any nation beſides Britain: but however enormous, yet it was no more than what was neceſſary. The militia were this year raiſed in ſeveral counties, and put under proper regulations; ſo that there was no reaſon to fear that the internal peace of the kingdom would be diſturbed.

The commons took into conſideration the ſtatute of the ninth of queen Anne, by which it is enacted, that no perſon ſhall be elected a knight of the ſhire, unleſs he is poſſeſſed of ſix hundred pounds per ann. nor any one returned to ſerve as a burgeſs, unleſs he had three hundred. It ſeems that this act, however ſalutary, and calculated to promote the intereſt of the people, by ſupporting the dignity of parliament, had been proſtituted to the baſeſt purpoſes. Methods had been found out to elude the force of it, and many perſons had procured ſeats in the houſe of commons who were not qualified according to law.

To remedy an evil of ſo dangerous a nature, a bill was brought in, and paſſed both houſes, by which it is enacted, that every perſon duly elected ſhall, previous to his taking the oaths, deliver in to the clerk a true eſtimate of his eſtate, and that ſhall be left to be inſpected by any member who chuſes, and the newly elected member ſhall ſwear to the truth of the contents.

Several other acts paſſed, particularly one for the regulation of the payment of prize-money due to ſeamen, which before had been left to the diſcretion of the commiſſioners of the navy. A bill was brought in, and paſſed, for regulating weights and meaſures, and proper proviſion was made for raiſing the ſums granted to his majeſty. After which, the parliament was prorogued by commiſſion.

We have ſeen, in our account of laſt year's tranſactions, that, notwithſtanding the vigilance of commodore Boys, yet M. de Thurot had made his eſcape out of the harbour of Dunkirk with five ſhips, having on board, beſides ſeamen, above twelve hundred land forces. Proceeding to the northward, he entered the Baltic, and ſailed to Gottenburgh, where having taken in freſh proviſions, he returned, and anchored at Bergen, in Norway; for his deſign was to amuſe the Engliſh, and, if poſſible, keep his real intentions hid from them.

The weather, as is uſual in the northern ſeas, had been very ſtormy; and one of the ſhips in Thurot's ſquadron was ſeparated from the reſt, and obliged to return to France. With the four remaining ſhips, M. de Thurot ſailed from Bergen on the fifth of December 1759; and having paſſed the Orkneys, he got among the weſtern iſlands of Scotland, on one of which he landed on the ſixteenth of January this year. There he procured ſome live cattle, with other ſorts of freſh proviſions, and then ſet ſail for the north of Ireland. His deſign was to have got into the harbour of Derry; but a dreadful ſtorm ariſing, another of his ſhips was driven off, and he never ſaw her afterwards, though it appears that ſhe got ſafe back to France. At laſt they came to an anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus, and the ſame day the land forces were put on ſhore; but many of them were reduced to the moſt wretched condition by ſickneſs and bad proviſions.

The number of able men who bore arms amounted to little more than ſix hundred; and lieutenant Hall went off, with a party of men, to make proper obſervations on them, for as yet it was not known whether they were friends or enemies. Finding there was little doubt of their being French forces, he gave orders to his non-commiſſioned officers to take care that the enemy did not get round them to attack them in flank or rear; and then he returned to the town, and informed lieutenant-colonel Jennings.

The colonel ordered the gates and paſſes leading to the town to be blocked up and barricadoed with ſuch materials as could be procured. In the mean time, the French came up to the gates, but were repulſed by a ſmall number of Strode's regiment, moſt of whom had not been three months in the ſervice. It is probable that the place would not have been taken, had not there been a ſcarcity of ammunition; ſo that the parties at the gates were obliged to retreat, and take ſhelter in the caſtle. This gave the enemy an opportunity of getting in, and drawing up in the market-place; upon which it was found abſolutely neceſſary to capitulate, and the garriſon were allowed to march out with all the honours of war. It was ſtipulated, that no injury ſhould be done to the town; but the magiſtrates having neglected, or rather being unable to furniſh the French with freſh proviſions, the town was put under military execution, and great exceſſes were committed.

An expreſs having been ſent to the duke of Bedford, at that time lord deputy of Ireland, he diſpatched a meſſenger to captain Elliot at Kinſale, who immediately hoiſted his flag on board the Æolus, having with him the Pallas and Brilliant; and on the twenty-ſixth of February, he got ſight of the enemy, who had embarked their land forces, in order to return to France. He came up with them near the Iſle of Man, and a moſt deſperate engagement enſued, which laſted an hour and a half; but at laſt the brave Thurot was killed, and his ſhips ſtruck to captain Elliot.

In America, during the courſe of this year, the French ſpirited up ſume of the ſouthern Indians againſt the Engliſh; and a company of theſe barbarians formed a ſcheme to murder Mr. Atkins, who ſuperintended our commerce; and, to add to the attrociouſneſs of the crime, it was intended to have been committed while Mr. Atkins was engaged in a conference with them. One of the Indians, in the moſt cowardly manner, laying hold of a tomahawk, ſtruck Mr. Atkins on the head; but not having killed him, ſtruck a ſecond time, and miſſing his aim, wounded the clerk. It was neceſſary that an act of ſo atracious a nature ſhould not eſcape unnoticed; and therefore Mr. Atkins having diſpatched an expreſs to general Amherſt, that officer detached twelve hundred men to South-Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, now earl of Eglington, whoſe courage had ſhone conſpicuouſly on many former occaſions ſince the commencement of the war. In the month of June, he arrived at Charles-Town, and from thence proceeded to the Twelve Mile River, which he croſſed about the latter end of that month. He encamped the forces on a riſing ground, from whence he had a proſpect of the country: and being determined to ſurpriſe the enemy, he left a ſufficient number of men to take care of the tents, and with the reſt marched through the woods, till he came to an Indian town called Little Keowee, where the Indians fired upon him; but the Engliſh ſoldiers ruſhing in, put every one of them to the ſword. From thence the colonel marched to another Indian town, called Eſtatoe, conſiſting of about two hundred families; and they having abandoned their houſes, he ordered every one of them to be ſet on fire, after having ſeized on all the proviſions, and every thing of value.

The ſoldiers having found the body of an Engliſhman, who had been barbarouſly murdered by the Indians, it exaſperated them to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved to ſet no bounds to their reſentment. Accordingly, for ſome time, every priſoner taken by them was immediately put to death: and although humanity may blame their conduct in that affair, yet it was, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary, where they had to engage with ſavages, who paid no regard to the law of nations, and upon whoſe minds nothing leſs than terror would make any impreſſion.

As it was not the intention of colonel Montgomery to ſpread deſolation every where, he rather choſe to enter into a treaty with them; and, for that purpoſe, an Indian, named Makullakulla, and more commonly known by the name of the Little Carpenter, was given to underſtand, that peace would be granted them on proper terms. The Little Carpenter was always a friend to the Engliſh, and diſapproved of the conduct of his countrymen when they took up arms; ſo that no perſon was conſidered as more proper to negotiate an affair of ſuch importance.

The Little Carpenter left nothing undone to perſuade his countrymen, the Cherokees, to accommodate matters with the Engliſh; but not being able to perſuade them to hearken to the voice of reaſon, the colonel continued his operations, and marched into the interior part of the country. As he was obliged to march through a wood, the Indians fired upon his men in ſo fierce a manner from behind the thickets, that captain Morriſon was killed, and part of the army obliged to give way. This diſaſter, however was ſoon overcome by the arrival of the grenadiers and light infantry, who puſhed forwards till they came to a riſing ground, from whence they diſcovered a body of the Indians encamped in the moſt ſecure manner. They attacked them with their bayonets at the head of their muſkets, and having forced them to give way, purſued them into the woods; and then the colonel continued his march till he came to the Indian town Etchowee, from whence all the inhabitants had fled; ſo that there was plenty of proviſions for the men, beſides ſeveral things of value, for they were permitted to plunder.

In the latter end of July, colonel Montgomery, after having undergone many hardſhips, and loſt about ſeventy men, arrived at fort Prince George, where the fatigued ſoldiers were permitted to refreſh themſelves ſeveral weeks. In the mean time, the Indians attacked Fort Loudon, on the confines of Virginia; and the garriſon not being able to hold out, were obliged to capitulate on honourable terms. It is remarkable in the North-American ſavages, contrary to the practice of heathens in general, that they never pay any regard to the faith of treaties. Thus, when the garriſon of Fort Loudon were on their march to Carolina, they were ſurpriſed by a body of the Cherokees, who maſſacred all the officers, except captain Stewart, and killed twenty-five of the private men, the reſt being made priſoners, and ſent into the heart of the country, where they were treated in the moſt cruel and inhuman manner, contrary to the articles of capitulation, by which it had been agreed that no hurt ſhould be done to them.

The Little Carpenter, who ſeems to have been endowed with all thoſe qualities which are neceſſary to conſtitute the character of a great man, generouſly laid down all he had in the world for the ranſom of captain Stewart; and that officer having been conducted to Holſton river, met with major Lewis, who had advanced ſo far at the head of a party of Virginians.

In North-America, during this year, the war was carried on with great vigour, and, at the ſame time, with equal ſucceſs. The Engliſh were in poſſeſſion of all Canada, except the town of Montreal, and ſome other forts on the river St. Laurence; and the chevalier de Levit, who commanded the French forces in thoſe parts, reſolved to attempt the recovery of Quebec. General Murray, who had been left commander of that place, received notice of the approach of the enemy; and finding that they had landed, he ordered all the bridges to be broken down, and the roads rendered almoſt impaſſable. Next day the general began his march to meet them; but they retreated at his approach, upon which he returned to Quebec. Upon his retreat, the enemy, amounting to near twelve thouſand, including the ſavages, having recovered their ſpirits, wheeled about, and marched towards Quebec: upon which general Murray, notwithſtanding the inferiority of his numbers, reſolved to give them battle. Accordingly he marched out, and a moſt bloody engagement enſued; but the French were ſo numerous, that general Murray was obliged to retreat, and take ſhelter within the walls of Quebec, which he determined to hold out to the laſt extremity. On the firſt of May, the enemy began to cannonade the place; but the garriſon made ſuch a vigorous defence, that ſeveral of the enemy's batteries were ſilenced, while the firing of the others continued to ſlacken gradually: but, notwithſtanding, there is reaſon to believe that the garriſon would have been obliged to ſurrender, had not lord Colville come to their aſſiſtance. That nobleman having ſailed from Hallifax, met with great oppoſition, by reaſon of the vaſt ſhoals of ice which blocked up the river, and the thick fogs, which, during that ſeaſon, are very dangerous to the ſhipping. At laſt, through innumerable difficulties, he was enabled to ſend a veſſel into the harbour of Quebec, to inform the general that the fleet was making way to aſſiſt him. On the fifteenth of May, commodore Swanton arrived with the firſt diviſion of the ſquadron; and next morning, in conſequence of orders from the general, he attacked the French veſſels which lay above the town, and deſtroyed ſeveral of them. This was a moſt mortifying ſtroke to the French army; and, in conſequence thereof, they raiſed the ſiege, leaving behind them all their artillery and proviſions. As ſoon as general Murray found that they had retreated, he drew out the garriſon, in order to haraſs them in the rear; but they had croſſed a river, ſo that it was not judged prudent to purſue them any farther.

During the whole of this year, general Amherſt, commander in chief of the army in America, left nothing undone to ſupport the honour and intereſt of his country; and all thoſe officers and ſoldiers who fought under him, acted in ſuch a manner, that many of the Indians were brought over to our intereſt, and became our allies.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting in America, the French and the allied army continued ſkirmiſhing with each other in Germany; and although no general could have behaved with greater courage, or diſplayed more ſhining qualities, than prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, yet the country had been ſo much exhauſted, that his army was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, burning for military glory, boldly attacked a large party of the French at Corbach, and would have totally defeated them, had not freſh reinforcements come up to their aſſiſtance. This obliged the prince to retreat; but within a few days afterwards, he engaged another party of the French, and, by the aſſiſtance of Elliot's light horſe, five battalions were made priſoners of war. At the ſame time, their military cheſt fell into the hands of the allies, with all their arms and ammunition: and, what was moſt remarkable, this victory was wholly owing to the bravery of a new regiment of light horſe, compoſed of young recruits who had never before ſeen an engagement.

Prince Ferdinand, who was much better acquainted with the country than any of the French generals, haraſſed their army in detached parties; and at laſt found himſelf under the neceſſity of coming to an engagement at a place called Warbourg, where the French were totally defeated; ſo that a communication was opened between Hanover, Weſtphalia, and the allied army.

In leſs than a week after this engagement, the hereditary prince ſet out on an expedition, with a choſen body of light troops; and, in the moſt courageous manner, beat up the French quarters, and drove them from Dymel with great ſlaughter.

In the eaſtern part of Germany, the king of Pruſſia was in the moſt diſtreſſed ſituation; but his brother prince Henry, one of the moſt accompliſhed generals of the age, acted with ſuch prudence and circumſpection, that he contributed, in a great meaſure, towards retarding the progreſs of the Ruſſians, who, by this time, had made an irruption into the province of Sileſia, and were ſpreading devaſtation wherever they came, without regard to age or ſex, or any other diſtinction.

The Pruſſian monarch was every where engaged; for no ſooner had he defeated one party of the enemy, than another ſtarted up; while count Daun, who watched all his motions, continued to haraſs his rear whenever his army ſtruck their tents. This brought on a general engagement near Torgau, on the banks of the Elbe, which gave a new turn to the affairs of Europe, and was attended with conſequences of the moſt important nature.

Marſhal Daun was fluſhed with ſucceſs: he looked upon the king of Pruſſia as one devoted to deſtruction, and imagined that one action more would totally ruin him. But nothing is more uncertain than the fate of generals and armies, nor are any in ſo much danger as thoſe who look upon their enemy with contempt. The king of Pruſſia was now almoſt deſperate; he had no where to turn himſelf, without meeting with one enemy or another to oppoſe him: his hereditary dominions were in a manner ruined, his moſt important forts were taken from him, and therefore, with the ſame preſence of mind that had ſupported him under all his difficulties, he ventured upon an engagement.

Marſhal Daun had drawn up his army in the moſt excellent order; but notwithſtanding that, the king of Pruſſia ventured to attack him on the third day of November, about two in the afternoon. The Auſtrians exerted themſelves with great bravery; but the perſeverance of the Pruſſians obliged them to give way, and count Daun found himſelf under the neceſſity of retreating towards Bohemia, after he had loſt a great number of his men.

Thus the Pruſſians were left in poſſeſſion of the field, and a communication was opened between their different parties, ſo that they could occaſionally aſſiſt each other. Indeed, of all the victories gained by the king of Pruſſia, this was the moſt important; for had he been defeated, he would have been totally ruined. He was like one who had his way to work through walls, redoubts, and enchantments; but by his conduct on this ever memorable day, he ſet himſelf, as it were, at liberty, and even became greater than ever. His army received freſh ſupplies, proviſions were brought to them in great plenty; and although many of his ſoldiers were only raw young fellows, yet the conduct of their ſovereign operated ſo ſtrongly on their minds, that nothing ſeemed too difficult for them.

While the public affairs were conducting in this manner, while the Britiſh arms were crowned with ſucceſs in every part of the world where they were engaged, her triumphs were in ſome meaſure damped by the loſs of that perſon whoſe preſence gave life to them. The venerable George the ſecond, who had been bleſſed with a longer life than any king of England ſince the Norman conqueſt, was on the morning of the twenty-fifth of October, ſeized with a fit in his palace at Kenſington, and expired without either pangs or convulſions. His majeſty had got up at his uſual hour, and having drank a diſh of chocolate, he enquired of the page concerning the weather, being anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails. He then ſignified his intention of walking in the garden; but had ſcarce uttered the words when he fell down, and before his daughter, the princeſs Amelia, could come to aſſiſt him, according to his deſire, he died in the arms of his ſervants.

His majeſty was in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, well ſhaped, of a middling ſtature, and a bright countenance. In his natural temper as a man, he was apt to be paſſionate and haſty; but in his public conduct, no prince acted with more deliberation and coolneſs. In all his intentions he appears to have been ſincere; for when he entered into any public treaty, nothing could induce him to recede from his engagements. The ſervants in his houſhold, particularly thoſe who were more immediately about his perſon, were ſeldom changed, they lived to have grey hairs like their royal maſter. From this circumſtance we may infer, that whatever he was in his private character as a man of a paſſionate diſpoſition, yet notwithſtanding he muſt have been a good maſter. That he was a tender and an indulgent parent, is evident from the whole of his behaviour to his children; and to his royal conſort, who, indeed, was an ornament to her ſex. In public, with reſpect to party diſputes, the king was, during the firſt years of his reign, ſtrongly attached to a miniſter whoſe converſation he delighted in, and whoſe abilities he eſteemed; but when he found it neceſſary, in order to ſilence the public clamour, to diſmiſs him from his ſervice, he never afterwards gave himſelf much concern who were to be his miniſters. He was perfectly acquainted with the intereſts of the ſeveral courts of Europe, and never took up arms till in a manner he was forced to it. By his conduct the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria were prevented from being diſmembered, and many millions were expended for that purpoſe; his majeſty well knowing that the ſafety of Europe, and the intereſt of the proteſtant religion depended on preventing the French coming into Germany. But notwithſtanding his zeal in favour of the Auſtrian family, yet he remained no longer their friend than they were the friends of the empire; from which we may conclude that he had a good heart, and a clear as well as a ſolid underſtanding.

All party diſtinctions were buried in oblivion at the time of his death; and thoſe unfortunate young gentlemen, whoſe fathers had been concerned in the rebellion, were provided for either in the army or navy. Such as were diſaffected to the government, blamed his majeſty for a partial attachment to his German dominions, without conſidering that he never neglected to attend to the affairs of Britain. Born and educated in Hanover, it was natural for him to love that country. He lived in it till he was in the thirty-ſecond year of his age, ſo that he never attained a perfect knowledge of the Engliſh language; a circumſtance that has been much dwelt on by ſome late authors, who from thence infer, that he was not a friend to learning. Nothing, however, can be more falſe; for it is well known that he eſtabliſhed the famous univerſity of Gottingen, on the moſt extenſive plan, and filled the chairs with profeſſors of ſuch abilities, that he lived to ſee it the moſt ſhining ſeminary in Europe. He ordered all the books that had been collected by the kings of England ſince the time of Henry VII. to be depoſited in the Britiſh Muſeum; and there he ordered to be depoſited all the manuſcript letters written by any of our ſovereigns, from the death of Edward III. to the death of queen Anne. Queen's College in Oxford, was in a manner almoſt rebuilt at his expence, and many new profeſſorſhips were added both to the Engliſh and Scotch univerſities. Let hiſtory be ranſacked from the moſt early ages, few princes will be found like George II. who could unite, in his own perſon, two virtues totally oppoſite, namely, that of being able to conduct the affairs of two different governments. In Hanover, though poſſeſſed of abſolute unlimitted power, yet he exerted that power in making his ſubjects happy, and was conſidered by them as an indulgent parent. In Britain, where his conduct was circumſcribed by law, he acted like a wiſe magiſtrate, and never undertook any thing of importance, till he had firſt conſulted his parliament, by whoſe advice he was conſtantly directed.

Upon the whole, if George II. was not ſo brilliant in what was commonly called wit, yet he had the moſt ſolid judgment, which, perhaps, is a thouſand times ſuperior. He grew up, as it were, to an advanced age in the love of his ſubjects both at home and abroad; every year made him more beloved than the laſt; and when he paid the debt of nature, one tear was ſhed for him; or, in other words, the whole nation mourned at once. He left a moſt glorious example to his ſucceſſor, which it is hoped he will never deviate from; and, in general, his ſubjects were rich and happy.

With reſpect to the ſtate of learning during this long reign, it continued advancing towards perfection. Many great men made their appearance in the literary world, and although they did not make ſuch a ſhining figure as ſome have done in the preſent reign, yet they laid a foundation for the nobleſt improvements in every art or ſcience. Simpſon, Saunderſon, and McLaurin carried the knowledge of the mathematics to an height unknown before. Phyſic and natural hiſtory were cultivated by many learned gentlemen, among whom were Dr. Mead and Sir Hans Sloane, and the Doctors Warburton and Newton ſtood forth in defence of Divine Revelation. In a word, the reign of George II. produced many great men, ſome of whom are now bright ornaments to their country, while ſuch as are dead, have left behind them the moſt illuſtrious examples.

From the death of George II.

GEORGE III.

A. D. 1760. GEORGE III. ſucceeded his grandfather in the twenty-third year of his age, after having received a liberal education. The privy-council was immediately aſſembled, when his majeſty informed the members that he was determined to act on the ſame principles as his royal grandfather, and that he had no other intention but that of promoting the happineſs of his people. His majeſty then took the oaths to maintain the church of Scotland as by law eſtabliſhed; and having ſigned two inſtruments for that purpoſe, one of them was depoſited among the archives of the council, and the other tranſmitted to Edinburgh, to be recorded in the court of ſeſſion. The next thing done by his majeſty was to aſſemble both houſes of parliament, not to tranſact any buſineſs but that of ſwearing in the members, whoſe oaths of allegiance were become abſolved by the death of the late king. The duke of Rutland, being conſtituted high-ſteward, ſwore in all the commons; and the lord-keeper adminiſtered the oaths to the peers. It is almoſt impoſſible to conceive the ſatisfaction that the ſubjects, in general, expreſſed at the conduct of their young ſovereign, and his many virtues made them almoſt forget the loſs they had ſuſtained by the death of his royal predeceſſor.

On the eighteenth of November both houſes of parliament met, and the king was conducted to the houſe amidſt the acclamations of a brave and loyal people. In his ſpeech he told them, that he was ſenſible of their loſs in the death of his grandfather, but that it ſhould be the whole ſtudy of his life to make them happy, by promoting their intereſts both at home and abroad. He ſollicited the aſſiſtance of all his ſubjects in general, as he was determined to act in ſuch a manner as was conſiſtent with his duty both to God and men. He rejoiced that he was born and educated in this iſland, and that the name of a Briton was to him ſuperior to all others. The vaſt ſucceſs that had attended our army and navy were both attended to, and his majeſty requeſted that the commons would grant the neceſſary ſupplies.

Addreſſes from both houſes, full of the moſt loyal expreſſions, were preſented to his majeſty; and the commons granted the ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to defray the expences of the civil liſt.

A. D. 1761. The firſt thing done by the parliament, after the holidays were over, was to paſs an act in favour of inſolvent debtors; who, in conſequence of giving up all their effects, were to be diſcharged by the juſtices at the quarter-ſeſſions. No act was ever brought into the houſe at a more ſeaſonable juncture; for the priſons were filled with poor unfortunate creatures, whoſe wives and children were ſtarving. This act, however, had in it a clauſe, attended with ſuch conſequences, that it was found neceſſary to repeal it. It was imagined that every creditor might compel a debtor to give up his effects, and if he concealed any of them, to the amount of twenty pounds, he was to ſuffer death as a felon. This clauſe was laid hold of by many of the lower ſorts of tradeſmen, who, in order to cheat their creditors, got one of their own relations to compel them to account; ſo that a door was opened for perjury, and many perſons were deprived of their property under the proſtituted authority of an act of parliament. Indeed, the abuſe became ſo glaring, that the city of London preſented a petition to have it repealed; but it did not take place till the meeting of the new parliament.

The king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, importing, that as nothing could contribute more towards promoting the intereſts of the people, than that of rendering the judges independent, ſo he deſired they would grant him leave to advance their ſalaries, and that they ſhould hold their places by patent for life; for by the act of ſettlement, at the revolution, they were to expire within ſix months after the death of the king. In conſequence of this meſſage, the ſalaries of the nine puiſne judges in England were advanced from fifteen hundred, to two thouſand pounds and the three chiefs in proportion. In Scotland, the lord preſident, inſtead of one thouſand pounds a year, was allowed thirteen hundred; the lords of ſeſſion ſeven hundred inſtead of five; and the lords of juſticiary, one thouſand inſtead of ſeven hundred.

On the continent of Europe moſt of the powers engaged in the war, were deſirous to propoſe preliminaries for a laſting peace; but in Germany, the armies continued to fight in detached parties. For this purpoſe ſeveral ambaſſadors were ſent to different courts, and among the reſt, M. de Buſſy came over from Paris to London, in order to adjuſt matters concerning our diſputes in America, and Mr. Stanley went on the ſame errand to Paris. Some months were ſpent in negotiations, without coming to any concluſion; when the French, by deluſive promiſes, brought the king of Spain to concur with them in the proſecution of the war.

In the mean time the iſland of Belliſle was taken from the French by general Hodgſon, and a ſquadron of ſhips of the line, commanded by commodore Keppel; but this conqueſt was not obtained without great difficulties, for the Engliſh loſt near two thouſand men.

In Germany, prince Ferdinand with the allied army penetrated into Thuringia, and drove the French from ſeveral of their advanced poſts; but the duke de Broglio, having collected his army together, attacked the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, and made above two thouſand of his men priſoners of war.

In the Eaſt-Indies, colonel Coote, in conjunction with admiral Stevens, took the French town of Pondicherry, by which the French loſt all their ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel. This was a ſudden and moſt unexpected blow, which ruined the French commerce; for although they left nothing undone to ſtir up the mogul in their favour, yet the bravery of the Engliſh overcame all their attempts, and they were beaten in every quarter.

The Britiſh arms in America were ſtill triumphant, ſo that our miniſtry had it in their power to make peace on what conditions they pleaſed; but we muſt now turn our thoughts to another ſubject.

In the month of July his majeſty, having aſſembled the privy-council, declared to them his intention of marrying the princeſs Charlotte of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, a young lady poſſeſſed of every valuable accompliſhment, accompliſhment, and the admiration of all thoſe who had the pleaſure of being acquainted with her. The council were ſo well ſatisfied with his majeſty's choice, that they not only commended it, but at the ſame time deſired that he would make it public to all his ſubjects; and accordingly, a proclamation was inſerted in the Gazette, intimating, that the obligation he was under to his people, induced him to fix his mind on a princeſs, whom he intended to make his conſort, in order to promote the intereſt of the proteſtant religion conſiſtent with the act of ſettlement.

The earl of Harcourt was then ſent over ambaſſador extraordinary, to marry the princeſs by proxy, which being done, lord Anſon was diſpatched with the royal yachts, and a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips to convoy her to England. The ladies employed to attend the princeſs, were the dutcheſſes of Hamilton and Ancaſter; and on the eighth of Auguſt the fleet ſet ſail from Stade, amidſt the acclamations of the people. The wind, having ſhifted to the ſouth, the paſſage was very tedious, and moſt of the ladies on board were taken extremely ill; but the princeſs maintained ſuch a flow of ſpirits and vivacity, that ſhe charmed all thoſe who approached her.

In the afternoon of the ſeventh of September, the ſquadron came to an anchor at Harwich, and the princeſs, with her retinue, being landed, ſhe proceeded on her journey through Colcheſter, and lodged that night at Witham, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Abercorn. Vaſt crouds of people came to ſee her, and next day ſhe was met at Rumford by the king's coaches, eſcorted by a party of the horſe-guards. From Rumford ſhe proceeded, through innumerable crouds of people, to Whitechapel; and without entering the city, turned up towards the New Road, and ſo on till ſhe came to the gate of St. James's, where ſhe was received by the duke of Devonſhire, as lord-chamberlain of the houſhold. She was then conducted by the duke of York to the king, who received her in the moſt affectionate manner; and at nine in the evening the nuptial ceremony was performed in the Chapel Royal, by Dr. Secker, archbiſhop of Canterbury. On the twenty-ſecond of September their majeſty's were crowned in the abbey church of Weſtminſter, and addreſſes of congratulation were ſent up from all the cities and corporations in the kingdom.

In the mean time the war was carried on with great fury between the allies and the French, for the latter were ſo impoveriſhed, and all their funds ſo exhauſted, that they knew not what to do, unleſs by one bold ſtroke they ſhould force a way into Hanover. The duke de Broglio reſolved to attack the advanced poſts under the command of the marquis of Granby; but the prince of Brunſwick had notice of his intentions, and took his meaſures accordingly. The allied army was drawn up with great judgment, and ſtretched in one continued line over ſeveral riſing grounds; being flanked on one ſide by the river Aeſt, and on the other by a moraſs. Towards the evening of the ſixteenth of July, the French began the attack; but the allies, who behaved with the greateſt bravery, drove them back, and forced them to take ſhelter in the woods. In the mean time the allies, finding that the French intended to come to a general engagement, prepared to meet them; and next morning at three o'clock, both armies were drawn up. The firing continued about five hours, till the French, having taken poſſeſſion of a riſing ground on the flank of the Britiſh horſe, began to erect a battery upon it; but the prince of Brunſwick ſent a freſh body of foot to diſlodge them, and then they fell into confuſion. Vaſt numbers of the French were killed; but prince Ferdinand had drawn up his men in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that he did not loſe above five hundred.

This battle was fought near the village of Werle, and did great honour to the prince, as well as all the officers and ſoldiers in the allied army. It was not, however, deciſive; for the French ſtill ſeemed inexhauſtable in numbers. They were continually receiving new reinforcements, ſo that the prince was obliged to exert himſelf to the utmoſt to oppoſe them.

The prince de Soubiſe was detached towards Munſter, with a view of beſieging that city; and as the prince of Brunſwick was obliged to watch the motions of marſhal Broglio, ſeveral ſmart ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties; but the allies ſeemed, in general, to gain the advantage. The prince of Brunſwick was ſo well acquainted with the country, and had formed ſuch a proper judgment of the deſigns of the French, that he marched firſt towards Heſſe, and then, by a movement to the left, wheeled about towards Paderborn, by which he was prepared to meet marſhal Broglio whenever he thought proper to advance. The French, during this time, took ſeveral ſmall towns, and committed great cruelties, beſides demanding very heavy contributions. Prince Ferdinand found it abſolutely neceſſary to keep his army together, leſt they ſhould have been weakened by ſeparation; and although he could not act offenſively, yet the ſituation of his camp was ſuch, that it would have been dangerous for the enemy to attack him, eſpecially as he was well ſupplied with proviſions.

During the month of June this year, the iſland of Dominique, in the Weſt Indies, was taken from the French, by a party of Engliſh forces under the command of lord Rollo, and aſſiſted by commodore Sir James Douglas, with four ſhips of the line. At firſt the inhabitants would have ſubmitted, but M. de Longprie, the governor, ſtirred them up to hold out, under pretence that ſome ſhips would ſoon arrive to their aſſiſtance.

Lord Rollo, finding him obſtinate, landed with a party of grenadiers, commanded by colonel Melville, and drove the enemy from their advanced poſts, after which they proceeded to the head quarters of the governor, whom they took priſoner with all his officers. Next day the magiſtrates, and indeed all the inhabitants of the iſland, except the ſoldiers, took the oaths to our government. The forts that had been damaged were repaired, and every thing ſettled in a proper manner; after which lord Rollo and Sir James Douglas ſet ſail for the iſland of Guadalupe.

The Spaniards had now, in ſome meaſure, pulled off the maſk; and as their deſigns could be no longer concealed, Mr. Pitt propoſed in council, that a fleet ſhould be ſent to intercept their flota, that was coming from the Weſt Indies, but this was oppoſed by the majority of members. This great miniſter, by whoſe wiſdom and integrity the Britiſh arms had become ſucceſsful in every part of the globe, was well convinced that his opinion was of too much importance to be ſlighted; and therefore he reſigned all his employments. Certain it is, that no man was ever better qualified to conduct the affairs of government than Mr. Pitt. To a liberal education, he had joined an extenſive reading; and his conduct in parliament convinced the Britiſh ſenate, that his memory was equal to his judgment and eloquence. His majeſty was ſo ſenſible of the vaſt abilities of this great man, that he ſettled on him a penſion of three thouſand pounds per annum, for life, and for the life of his ſon; his lady being, at the ſame time, created a peereſs in her own right.

On the third of November the new parliament aſſembled, and Mr. Onſlow, who had been ſpeaker thirty-three years, reſigned on account of his great age and infirmities. The commons having elected Sir John Cuſt in his room, the king approved of their choice; and then going to the houſe, delivered a ſpeech to the following import:

He told them, that the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms muſt give pleaſure to all his faithful ſubjects; and as the enemy ſtill refuſed to hearken to proper conditions of peace, he was determined to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour; and for that purpoſe doubted not but the commons would aſſiſt him with the proper ſupplies. He told them, that the proper eſtimates ſhould be laid before them, and that the utmoſt œconomy ſhould be obſerved by himſelf. He concluded by recommending to them the making a ſuitable proviſion for the queen, who was, in every reſpect, an ornament to her ſex: and, in anſwer to this ſpeech, both houſes preſented moſt loyal addreſſes.

The earl of Briſtol, who had been ſome time at the court of Spain, was ordered to demand why they committed depredations on our commercial navy; but the anſwers he received were no better than evaſions. The earl finding that no dependence could be placed on what the Spaniſh miniſtry ſaid, returned to England; and the count de Fuentes, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, left London, after having delivered a memorial to the ſecretary of ſtate, wherein he attempted to juſtify the conduct of his court.

A. D. 1762. The firſt thing of national importance undertaken this year, was the granting of letters to our captains of ſhips, to make repriſals on the Spaniards; and in two days afterwards, namely, on the fourth of January, war was declared. On the nineteenth the king went to the houſe of peers, and laid before the parliament the whole of his proceedings in this affair; upon which they promiſed to aſſiſt him in the war to the utmoſt, being convinced that his deſigns were juſt.

A large fleet had ſailed from Portſmouth in October the preceding year, in order to attack ſuch of the French ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies as had not been ſubdued; and the whole fleet, with the tranſports, were ordered to rendezvous at Barbadoes. There they were joined by ſome tranſports from North-America, having on board a conſiderable number of land-forces, their deſign being to attempt the conqueſt of the valuable iſland of Martinico. This was one of the moſt important objects the miniſtry had in view; for, beſides the intrinſic wealth of the iſland, it was the center of all the French trade and commerce in the Weſt-Indies. The towns and harbours were ſtrongly fortified; and the roads in the interior part of the iſland were guarded by militia, and defended by redoubts. The attempt was attended with every danger that could be imagined; for the climate was extremely hot; and the freſh water being ſcarce, there was reaſon to fear that both the ſeamen and ſoldiers would be thrown into fluxes, which would prove more detrimental to them than the force of the enemy.

The fleet was under the command of admiral Rodney; and general Monkton, who had ſo bravely diſtinguiſhed himſelf in North-America, conducted the land-forces, amounting to eighteen battalions, but many of the companies were not full. On the eighth of January, they came to an anchor in the bay of St. Ann, near the eaſtern part of the iſland, where the men of war ſilenced ſome batteries which had been erected by the French; but the general being of opinion that it was not a proper place to land the forces, the colonels Grant and Haviland were ſent, with two brigades, under a proper convoy, to the bay of Petiteanſe, where they took a ſtrong battery from the enemy. On the ſixteenth, the whole army on board the tranſports being come up, the general landed them without oppoſition, but found the roads almoſt impaſſable. On the twenty-fourth, the general attacked a fort that guarded one of the paſſes leading to Port-Royal, and took it, after a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, while colonel Grant ſtormed the advanced poſts.

The Britiſh forces marched on with ſuch rapidity, that, in two days, they were in poſſeſſion of all the out-works which defended the citadel: upon which the governor, finding himſelf unable to hold out the place any longer, conſented to capitulate. On the eighth of February, the Engliſh being in poſſeſſion of the gates, the garriſon, amounting to about eight hundred men, were ſuffered to march out with all the honours of war; but the governor-general of the iſland, who reſided at St. Pierre, declared that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity. This, however, was only a vain bravado; for the Engliſh, having made themſelves maſters of all the other parts of the iſland, prepared to attack that place, when deputies were ſent to the general, offering to capitulate. By theſe means, not only the valuable iſland of Martinico became the property of Great-Britain, but, at the ſame time, it opened a way for the conqueſt of the ſmaller iſlands and ſettlements adjoining to it.

An important object now preſented itſelf to the Britiſh miniſtry, namely, that of carrying the war againſt Spain into the Weſt-Indies, from whence all their riches are derived. The Havannah, the center of their Indian commerce, was at that time ſtrongly defended, and it was reckoned impoſſible to take it; but nothing was too difficult for the Britiſh forces to undertake. Nineteen ſhips of the line, with many ſmaller veſſels, were fitted out, under the command of admiral Pocock; and about ten thouſand land-forces, commanded by the earl of Albemarle.

Perhaps no expedition was ever attended with more dangerous conſequences, nor any conducted with greater prudence. At firſt, the admiral intended to have landed on the ſouth ſide of the iſland of Cuba, where it was ſuppoſed he might fall in with the Spaniſh galleons; but that opinion was over-ruled in a council of war, and the fleet continued on a courſe of ſeven hundred miles, in a very dangerous ſea.

The admiral had no pilot to direct him; but being in poſſeſſion of an excellent chart of thoſe ſeas, taken by lord Anſon, he depended on his own judgment, and diſpatched a ſhip to make proper enquiries whether there was a probability of paſſing. On the return of the ſhip, the admiral ordered the fleet to weigh anchor, and hoiſt ſail, continuing under way, in three diviſions, conſiſting of the ſhips of the line, the frigates, and the tranſports. On the ninth of June, they got out of theſe dangerous ſeas, and came within ſight of St. Jago, on the eaſtern extremity of the iſland of Cuba. St. Jago is the capital of Cuba; but although the courts of juſtice are held there, yet the Havannah is the ſeat of commerce, and, conſequently, of the utmoſt importance. From St. Jago the fleet continued their voyage to the Havannah; but when they arrived there, they found they had more difficulties to encounter than they had as yet imagined.

The paſſage to the harbour is extremely narrow, and above half a mile in length, at the end of which is a large baſon, in which a thouſand ſhips may ride in ſafety. On the one ſide of the narrow paſſage is the Moro Caſtle, a ſtrong fort built for the defence of the place, and to prevent any ſhips from coming in but ſuch as have paſſports. To the weſtward of the harbour ſtands the town, ſtrongly fortified with a parapet, redoubts and baſtions; the whole being ſurrounded by a ditch, and cannon placed every where. Indeed, the difficulties they had to encounter ſeemed inſurmountable; and the admiral, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, bore away, with a large part of the fleet, to the weſtward, where he made as if he would have landed; while commodore Keppel and captain Hervey landed the forces on the eaſt of the harbour without the loſs of a man, although the Spaniards had a conſiderable fleet then lying at anchor, which might have done them great damage.

The earl of Albemarle divided the army into eight brigades; one of which, under the command of general Elliot, was ordered to march up the country, in order to prevent any ſupplies being ſent to the town, and to cover the ſiege in the rear. General Keppel and colonel Howe were ordered to make a diverſion on the weſt of the town; while the general, with the main body of the forces, attacked the Moro Caſtle, that being the grand object in view, becauſe it defended the entrance to the harbour.

Thoſe who will compare the account of this famous ſiege with the retreat of Xenophon, or the paſſage of Hannibal over the Alps, will prefer the valour of the Britiſh troops to that of either the Greeks or Carthaginians. There was no freſh water to be had; and as the men were obliged to cut their way through woods, and drag the cannon along with them, ſo many of them died on the ſpot through the heat of the climate, and the fatigues they underwent in the ſervice of their country. But courage and perſeverance overcame all difficulties; for batteries were erected in the night on the riſing grounds, to cover the approaches, and make way for the reduction of the place. To do juſtice to the Spaniards, it muſt be acknowledged that they defended the place with great bravery, and, for ſome time, the fire was, in a manner, equal on both ſides. On the twenty-ninth of June, in the evening, they made a ſally; but although they acted with great courage and reſolution, they were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of above three hundred men.

All the batteries being now opened, the admiral ordered the Cambridge, the Dragon, and the Marlborough, to ſail up to the fort, under the command of captain Hervey; and then a moſt dreadful firing began. The Spaniſh artillery was well conducted, and it would ſeem that the beſt officers under their government had been at that time in the Havannah. As the Moro Caſtle was ſituated on a high rock, the ſhips could not, after ſeven hours firing, make the leaſt impreſſion on it.

In this attack, the Engliſh loſt one hundred and fifty men; which is not to be wondered at, when we conſider that, beſides the Moro Caſtle, they had another battery playing upon them from an oppoſite fort, which galled them exceſſively; ſo that they were obliged to retire, otherwiſe they would have been deſtroyed. Among thoſe killed in this hazardous attempt, was captain Gooſtrey, a brave officer, who had, on many former occaſions, given the moſt ſignal proofs of his courage; but duty, and the love of glory, were the ſole objects he had in view.

No ſooner were the Engliſh men of war gone to rejoin the fleet, than the Spaniards turned their attention to the eaſtern part of the fort, and reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity; ſo that the Engliſh officers found the reduction of the place would be a work of time. Indeed, an unforeſeen accident happened at this time, which tended, in a great meaſure, towards retarding their operations, namely, the deſtruction of a battery, which took fire by the exploſion of a mortar. Sickneſs likewiſe rendered many of the men incapable of acting, and the few who remained in health were fatigued beyond deſcription. Add to this, the want of freſh proviſions, the heat of the climate, and the inſupportable fatigues which both officers and men underwent, by which many gave themſelves up to deſpair, and ſunk under the load of their miſery.

About this time, however, they received a very ſeaſonable ſupply; for a fleet arrived from New-York, and another from Jamaica, having on board a large quantity of proviſions, which gave new life and ſpirits both to the army and navy.

It was now evident that no time was to be loſt, and that, unleſs an immediate attack was made, the men would become diſpirited, and the whole enterprize ſink into nothing. It was therefore agreed, that the miners ſhould be employed; but they had a deep ditch to croſs, ſo that it was with the utmoſt difficulty they got over it, and entrenched themſelves under a rock, where they were not perceived by the enemy.

The governor of the Havannah, ſenſible that the Engliſh would make themſelves maſters of the Moro Caſtle, unleſs he could ſend freſh reinforcements to it, ordered twelve hundred men to be put on board the boats in the harbour, and to land and attack the Engliſh. Accordingly theſe men landed, and attacked our forces in three different places, but with ſo little ſucceſs, that upwards of four hundred were left dead on the ſpot; ſome were drowned, and the reſt, with much difficulty, ſaved themſelves, by getting into their boats.

On the thirtieth of July, the miners blew up a part of the wall, by which a breach was made; and although it was ſmall, yet the engineers were of opinion that the army might attack it. The Engliſh troops now mounted the breach in ſuch good order, that the enemy became intimidated, after above four hundred of them had been killed, among whom was the marquis de Gonſales, the ſecond in command, a brave officer, who had exerted himſelf to the utmoſt during the ſiege, and died animating the ſoldiers to defend the place. The ſame fate happened to Don Lewis de Velaſco, the commander in chief, who diſdaining to aſk quarters, collected as many men as yet remained, and making a ſtand with them, received a mortal wound while holding out his ſword to the conquerors.

The Engliſh being now in poſſeſſion of the fort, which had coſt them the lives of many brave men, during a ſiege of forty-four days, turned the cannon againſt the town. Several batteries were, at the ſame time, erected on the riſing grounds near the town; and the earl of Albemarle being willing to ſave as many lives as poſſible, ſent a meſſage to the governor, deſiring him to ſurrender, as it would be in vain to hold out any longer; but the governor, though he returned a polite anſwer to the earl, yet refuſed to comply, declaring that he would hold it out to the laſt extremity.

Immediately the firing began on both ſides; but in little more than ſix hours, all the artillery belonging to the enemy were ſilenced, and a flag of truce hung out, to the great joy both of the army and navy, who were in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions.

The garriſon were allowed to march out with all the honours of war: and thus the whole iſland of Cuba was given up to Great-Britain on the fourteenth of Auguſt. The enemy loſt their whole fleet that was in the harbour; a ſum of money, amounting to three millions, was taken by the victors; and the commerce of Spain in the Weſt-Indies was, for ſome time, totally ruined.

About this time, two Engliſh frigates took a rich Spaniſh ſhip near Cadiz; and having carried her into Gibraltar, found her cargo to conſiſt of near twelve millions of money, beſides many valuable articles of merchandize. Theſe were mortifying ſtrokes to the Spaniards, who had been led into a war without any apparent neceſſity, merely by the intrigues of the French, whoſe commerce had been totally ruined by the Engliſh cruizers. It was therefore reſolved upon, in the court of Madrid, that the kingdom of Portugal, with whom we were in the ſtricteſt alliance, ſhould be invaded; and a body of forces marched towards the frontiers, in order to diſtreſs the inhabitants.

The parliament met on the twenty-fifth day of November; and his majeſty, going to the houſe of peers, opened the ſeſſion, by telling them, that nothing was more deſireable to him than a laſting peace, procured on ſuch honourable terms as would ſecure the happineſs of his people. For that purpoſe, he had once more condeſcended to renew the negotiation that had been broken off before; and he ſpoke of the conduct of his army and navy in the higheſt terms of applauſe. He took notice, that he had been obliged to ſend an armed force to ſupport his good ally the king of Portugal, who was threatened by the whole Spaniſh army, in conſequence of the intrigues of the French, who, notwithſtanding their numerous loſſes, ſeemed ſtill averſe to peace. He concluded by telling the commons, that nothing gave him ſo much unhappineſs as the conſideration that his ſubjects were burdened with taxes; but then there was a neceſſity for it, otherwiſe it would have been impoſſible to have defeated the enemies ſchemes, and rendered their undertakings abortive.

At this time the duke of Bedford was ſent over to France in conſequence of the rage of party ſpirit at home, and preliminaries for a general peace were ſigned at Fontainbleau, and afterwards laid before the commons on the ninth of December. It was expected that theſe preliminaries would have been ſeverely cenſured; but they were approved of without much oppoſition, which encreaſed the public diſcontents more than ever.

On the twelfth of Auguſt, this year, the queen was delivered of a ſon, who was ſoon after created prince of Wales, and ſtill lives admired by the people, who expect that he will one day ſway the ſcepter of theſe kingdoms.

All Europe was now longing for peace; Spain had been brought into a ſnare, and Germany was drenched with blood; France was reduced to beggary, and the king of Pruſſia, who had weathered many ſtorms, and ſtill ſupported his ground againſt all his enemies, found his treaſury exhauſted, and his country in a manner depopulated. Britain alone was vigorous, for all oppoſition had given way to our arms, and therefore we had reaſon to expect peace upon whatever terms we thought proper to preſcribe.

A. D. 1763. The firſt thing of any importance that took place during the beginning of this year was the treaty of peace concluded at Paris, on the tenth day of February. By this treaty there was to be a general releaſe of priſoners not then exchanged, and they were to be ſent home to their reſpective countries, at the expence of the ſovereign who had them in cuſtody. Canada, Nova-Scotia, and the iſland of Cape Breton, were ceded to Great Britain; and it was ſtipulated, that the inhabitants ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of the Roman catholic religion, in the ſame way as if they had been under the French government. All ſuch of the inhabitants as did not chuſe to live under the Britiſh government, were to have liberty to diſpoſe of their eſtates, and to remove with their families to any part they thought proper; only that they were obliged, conſiſtent with the principles of equity and common ſenſe, to pay ſuch debts as they had contracted.

The river Miſſiſippi was to be the boundary between the Britiſh and French colonies in North America; and in the Weſt-Indies, the king of Great Britain gave up to the French the conquered iſlands of Martinico and Guadalupe, with all the ſmaller ones depending on them. The iſland of Belliſle was given in exchange for Minorca; and the Grenades, with all the other iſlands depending on them, were ceded to Britain. All our conqueſts on the river of Senegal, were confirmed to us; and in the Eaſt Indies part of the French ſettlements were reſtored, and part were retained. The French were obliged to give up ſuch places as they had taken poſſeſſion of in Germany; and in conſequence of the king of Spain's giving up all pretenſion to Florida, and ceding it to the Engliſh, the Havannah, with the whole iſland of Cuba, were to be reſtored. The king of Pruſſia was to remain in the ſame condition he was in before the commencement of the war; and the ſame was to take place with reſpect to the empreſs queen.

Such were the principal articles in this treaty of peace, and much has been ſaid both for and againſt it. On the one hand, it has been aſſerted, that as we had, at a vaſt expence of blood and treaſure, reduced the French nation to a ſtate of beggary, ſo we ought, in order to keep them humble, to have retained all the conqueſts to ourſelves; for by ſo doing, their commerce being effectually ruined, they would not have been able for many years to give us the leaſt diſturbance. On the other hand, it was urged, by ſuch as were friends to the peace, that the advantage to Britain was very great, and that we had not only regained the iſland of Minorca, but that we had acquired the moſt extenſive territories in North America and the Weſt Indies, which, if cultivated in a proper manner, would turn out to the advantage of the mother-country. It was urged further, that had we inſiſted on retaining all we might have loſt all. The body would have been too large for the head, and the inhabitants being moſtly French, they would have been obliged to keep up a large ſtanding army to enforce the execution of the laws, and promote good order among the people.

Such were the arguments uſed by the parties who took place at that time, and the reader is left to judge for himſelf, eſpecially as the affair is too recent to be critically animadverted upon. Certain it is, that a great many arguments may be uſed on both ſides; but the buſineſs of an hiſtorian is to relate facts, and leave the public to draw from them what inferences they think proper.

On the nineteenth of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech from the throne, expreſſed the utmoſt ſatisfaction, that they had approved of the treaty of peace; and that in conſequence thereof the horrors of war were now at an end. He added, that notwithſtanding the increaſe of his family, yet he would obſerve the ſtricteſt œconomy, and that his attention ſhould be placed on promoting the happineſs of his people.

As no men, whether ſoldiers or ſailors, had ever behaved better than the Engliſh during this war, ſo the firſt object the legiſlative power had in view was to beſtow upon them ſome marks of favour. Grants of lands were made to thoſe who choſe to ſettle in the conquered countries of North America; and by theſe prudent methods many perſons, who would otherwiſe have been an intolerable burthen to the nation, were decently provided for, and uſefully employed. This was moſt certainly an act of great humanity, and it is hoped will, in the end, be of the utmoſt ſervice to the mother-country; for the native French and civilized Indians in thoſe countries, will become familiarized to the Engliſh goverment, the freedom of enquiry in religious matters will deſtroy the bigotry and ſuperſtition of the Roman catholics, and gradually vaniſh away, while commerce will be cultivated as long as a good underſtanding ſubſiſts between the mother-country and the colonies.

With reſpect to the affairs of the continent during this year, moſt nations who had been engaged in the war, were employed in healing their bleeding wounds; or, in other words, they were endeavouring to repair ſuch loſſes as they had ſuſtained.

The empreſs of Ruſſia, who had ſucceeded her huſband Peter II. was eſtabliſhing ſchools and univerſities in her dominions, and learned men were invited from all parts of Europe to come and preſide over them. Nor was ſhe leſs attentive to commercial affairs; for ſhe eſtabliſhed factories at Aſtracan on the Walga, and Archangel on the White Sea. In Germany, the king of Pruſſia, ever attentive to the intereſts of his ſubjects, was employed in granting many immunities and privileges to the ſoldiers who had ſerved him during the war, and in promoting agriculture. He had eſtabliſhed a factory at Embden in Frieſland; but Hanover laying between that province and his hereditary dominions, it could not be improved in a proper manner.

The Dutch continued in their old tract of avarice, the drudges of all nations, and not friends to any. France, Spain, and Portugal, underwent no material changes, and in Italy every thing was quiet. In England party diſputes ran very high, as they had continued to do ever ſince Mr. Pitt had reſigned the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate. A political paper having made its appearance, great offence was taken at it; and a general warrant was iſſued to take the author, printers and publiſhers, into cuſtody. But the greateſt blunder was, that no name was inſerted in the body of the warrant, only that the meſſenger had verbal orders to take the perſon of Mr. Wilkes, at that time member for Ayleſbury, in Buckinghamſhire. However iniquitous and even ſtupid this action was, yet it had been long practiſed by miniſters of ſtate, and began to be conſidered as law. But notwithſtanding the practice ſeemed ſanctified by long cuſtom, yet no ſooner did Mr. Wilkes find himſelf injured, than he moved the court of Common-Pleas for a writ of Habeas-Corpus. The writ being ſerved on the deputy-governor of the Tower, where Mr. Wilkes was confined, he brought his priſoner to Weſtminſter-hall, where council was heard both for and againſt the legality of the commitment. Notice was taken in court, that Mr. Wilkes had been confined a cloſe priſoner, that his friends had been denied admittance to him, nor had he been ſo much as allowed the uſe of pen, ink or paper. Upon that the judges reprimanded the governor, and as they could not give judgment on that day, he was ordered back to the Tower, where his friends and lawyers were to have free acceſs to him.

On the ſixth of May, being again brought to the bar, the lord chief-juſtice delivered the opinion of the court; namely, that the priſoner muſt be diſcharged, and that as ſome illegal actions had been practiſed in the commitment, he was deſired to bring his action at common law for a treſpaſs, in order to recover damages.

A. D. 1764. This year naturally opens with the hiſtory of the then ſtate of America; for although peace had been concluded, yet the French, ever reſtleſs, had ſtirred up ſeveral of the Indian nations to murder ſuch of our people as reſided on the back ſettlements. Many of the innocent people were moſt barbarouſly murdered; and complaints thereof having been tranſmitted to general Gage, he reſolved to penetrate into thoſe remote countries inhabited by two fierce nations, called the Delawares and Shawaneſe. In conſequence of that ſpirited reſolution, colonel Bouquet was ſent from Fort Pitt, with a conſiderable number of forces; but it was ſo difficult to croſs the rivers, and ſo dangerous to march thro' the woods, that he did not arrive at Tuſcarowas, the place where the troops were to rendezvous.

No ſooner had the ſavages ſeen a body of armed men in poſſeſſion of their towns, than they were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation; for their chiefs had made them believe that their woods were inacceſſible; but now they found that they had been deceiving themſelves. Knowing that it was not in their power to engage with our forces, they had recourſe to negotiation; but the colonel was too well convinced of their want of ſincerity, to put any truſt or confidence in their promiſes. He inſiſted that all the priſoners ſhould be delivered up, and that they muſt ſend deputies to Sir William Johnſon to treat of a peace. Forty of their chief men were, at the ſame time, delivered up as hoſtages for the faithful performance of all the articles agreed on. Theſe preliminaries being ſettled, colonel Bouquet had all the priſoners delivered up to him, amounting to near four hundred, who had been cruelly confined in a ſtate of ſlavery.

The Engliſh ambaſſador at Paris repreſented to the French court, that ſome injury had been done to our new ſettlers in the conquered iſlands in the Weſt Indies; upon which the French miniſtry referred the ſettlement of all diſputes of that nature to our governor of Jamaica. At the ſame time, and for reaſons of a ſimilar nature, a remonſtrance was preſented to the court of Madrid, complaining that ſome of the Spaniſh ſubjects had driven the Engliſh logwood cutters from the bay of Honduras; upon which an order was ſent by the king of Spain to the governor of Jucatan, commanding him, under the ſevereſt penalties, to ſee that juſtice was done to the Engliſh. This order had the deſired effect; for ſuch as had been diſpoſſeſſed, were again re-inſtated, and all of them permitted to carry on the trade of logwood cutting without any moleſtation whatever. Upon the whole, it appears that the governor had acted without orders; for the king of Spain expreſſed great reſentment at his conduct, declaring that he had no intention of infringing the articles of peace.

In Europe, during the former part of this year, an event took place that has been attended with as fatal conſequences as any thing we meet with, either in ancient or modern hiſtory.

Poland, with reſpect to territory, a large fertile nation, adhered to the feudal law in its utmoſt rigour. There the government was Ariſtocratical, for altho' they had a king, yet his power was ſo circumſcribed that the government was, in every ſenſe of the word, lodged in the hands of the nobles. No ſubjects can ever be happy under ſuch a government, unleſs we could change the nature of man; for the Poliſh nobles, like the barons of old in England and Scotland, and indeed like all thoſe barbarians who overthrew the Roman empire, had the power of life and death; they could put their tenants to death without being obliged to give an account of their conduct; ſo that many innocent perſons were ſacrificed to the caprice of a little tyrant, who conſidered himſelf as above law.

Auguſtus, elector of Saxony, had been king of Poland about thirty years; but dying, it was neceſſary to look out for one to ſucceed him; for in that country the king is choſen by the nobles and the clergy. It ſeldom ever happens that there is an election of a king of Poland, without the other powers interfering in it; each endeavours to eſtabliſh ſome favourite of their own, and the conſequences often prove fatal to the unhappy ſubjects. The two candidates were the elector of Saxony, ſon of the late king of Poland, whoſe intereſt was ſupported by Spain, France and Auſtria; and the other was the prince Poniotowſki, a Poliſh nobleman of great fortune, univerſal learning, agreeable manner, and unſpotted morals. His cauſe was ſtrongly ſupported by the empreſs of Ruſſia, and the king of Pruſſia; but moſt of the biſhops and clergy were his enemies, becauſe he had travelled over moſt proteſtant countries in Europe, and ſeemed much addicted to a free and rational enquiry into every diſputed point in religion.

The prince, however, was elected, but not without great oppoſition; for the Roman catholic party entered a proteſt againſt the proceedings of the diet; and count Branitzki, who was at the head of the proteſters, finding the danger he was in, raiſed a large body of forces in order to protect himſelf. He was aſſiſted by ſome of the national troops, who had been rendered mad by the ſuggeſtions of the prieſts, and were now become real enthuſiaſts.

In the mean time a Ruſſian army entered Poland, and on the third of July the proteſters were defeated, and obliged to take refuge in Turky. At the ſame time the king, who, in conſequence of a cuſtom of the country, had changed his name to that of Staniſlaus, ſet himſelf about correcting ſuch abuſes as had crept into the government during the preceding reign; for ſo juſt were his notions of natural rights, and ſo enlarged was his mind by reading, ſtudy, and converſation, that like Agis, king of Sparta, he ſought to leſſen rather than enlarge the regal power.

In the Eaſt-Indies things began to have a very ſerious appearance, particularly, with reſpect to the ſettlements of the Engliſh company. Mir Jaffier Aly Cawn, who had murdered his maſter, and had been made nabob in his room, began his reign in the moſt cruel manner, by ordering all thoſe who were related to the late prince to be murdered; and, at the ſame time, becauſe he was threatened to be chaſtized by the Engliſh, entered into a league with ſeveral princes, who promiſed him their aſſiſtance.

This extravagance had reduced him to ſuch a wretched ſtate of poverty, that regardleſs of the obligations he was under to the Engliſh, he robbed ſeveral of their ſettlements; upon which the council at Calcutta, formed a deſign to dethrone him. It is evident, however, that the crimes with which they charged him, were ſuch as did not come under their cognizance; for whatever injury he had done to his own ſubjects, yet it ſhould be remembered, that he was a prince who had no right to give an account of his conduct to any but the Great Mogul, who was his abſolute ſovereign.

The company, however, proceeded in the execution of their ſcheme; and the nabob truſting to their humanity, reſigned the government, and went to reſide at Calcutta, while Meer Coſſim was placed on the throne in his room. This young prince, who was ſon-in-law to the former, was of a bold, enterpriſing diſpoſition; and being impatient of reſtraint, reſolved to throw off all dependence on the Engliſh. Accordingly he ſtrengthened himſelf by every meaſure he could think of, and began to exert that authority of which he conſidered himſelf legally poſſeſſed. He knew that the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company acted from motives of avarice; and as they had been indulged with many privileges by his predeceſſor, he reſolved to ſtrip them of them, and circumſcribe their power within narrower bounds. This alarmed the company; and Mr. Vanſittart, the governor, having concluded a treaty with him on diſadvantageous terms, the council at Calcutta were ſo much offended, that they entered a proteſt againſt it. They affirmed, that he had gone beyond the bounds of his commiſſion, and had aſſumed to himſelf a power with which the company had never inveſted him; and therefore they refuſed to abide by the treaty.

The event of theſe things was, that war was declared by the nabob againſt the Eaſt-India company; and ſome of his forces ſurprized, and cruelly murdered a party of the Engliſh troops. Such as were taken priſoners they immediately put to death. But this barbarity did not long remain unpuniſhed; for major Adams having marched againſt them, took Patna, a ſtrong city; while the nabob, who found it impracticable to carry on the war, fled to the dominions of Sujah Dowla, a neighbouring nabob, who acted as grand vizier to the Great Mogul. But although that prince granted him an aſylum in his territories, yet he refuſed to give him any farther aſſiſtance, leſt he ſhould have brought upon himſelf the reſentment of the Engliſh.

Such was the general ſtate of public affairs at the end of this year: and although the flames of civil war had been lighted up in Poland, yet there was little reaſon to imagine that Great-Britain would be concerned in it.

A. D. 1765. On the tenth of January, the parliament of Great-Britain was opened at Weſtminſter by his majeſty, who, in his ſpeech, informed the members, that there was not the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect that the peace of Europe would, in the leaſt, be diſturbed; for all the powers on the continent ſeemed intent on cultivating the friendſhip of Great-Britain, and adhering to the articles of the peace. To the commons his majeſty recommended the cultivation of thoſe provinces which had been taken during the war; and, above all things, to preſerve among themſelves harmony and unanimity, as the only means of promoting the public good. He concluded by telling the members of both houſes, that every ſcheme propoſed or undertaken by them for the happineſs of his ſubjects, ſhould receive his hearty concurrence; and that in all things where it was neceſſary to impoſe taxes, he deſired them to make them as eaſy as poſſible, that the people might not be too much burthened.

Both houſes preſented loyal addreſſes: and the houſe of commons, in order to raiſe the ſupplies for the current year, reſolved to put the Americans on the ſame footing as the inhabitants of Great-Britain, by obliging them to pay ſtamp-duties. Great oppoſition was made to this bill, but at laſt it paſſed, and received the royal aſſent. At the ſame time, ſurveyors were ſent over to the new ceded iſlands in the Weſt-Indies, to divide them into pariſhes, and make ſuch other regulations as were neceſſary.

The only buſineſs of any importance that came before the parliament this ſeſſion, beſides the raiſing the ſupplies, was the conſideration of a propoſal made by his majeſty for eſtabliſhing a regency, in caſe of his being taken off by death. The members of both houſes were ſo ſenſible of the neceſſity of ſuch a meaſure, that they preſented addreſſes to his majeſty; and an act paſſed, by which his majeſty was enabled to appoint the queen, with the princes of the blood, and all the great officers of ſtate jointly, regents during the minority of the prince; and that his majeſty ſhould further be allowed to add to the number of regents ſuch perſons as he thought proper, whoſe names ſhould be left, in caſe of his death, ſealed up in a deed, to be opened by the privy-council. This affair being ſettled, his majeſty, being indiſpoſed, on the eleventh of May prorogued the parliament, by commiſſion, after ſuch bills as had paſſed both houſes received the royal aſſent.

On the fifteenth of Auguſt this year, Francis, emperor of Germany, died ſuddenly at Inſpruck, whither he had gone to take leave of his ſecond ſon, to whom he had given the dutchy of Tuſcany. Much blood and treaſure had been expended by Great-Britain in raiſing this prince to the Imperial throne; and, in juſtice to him, it muſt be acknowledged, that although his conſort took part with the French during the late war, and involved her huſband in the quarrel, yet he was, in ſentiments, to the laſt, a friend to England, and grateful for the kindneſs they had ſhewn him. Francis was ſucceeded by his ſon Joſeph, who had been previouſly elected king of the Romans; a prince of great abilities, inflexible virtue, ſtrict integrity, and honoured and beloved by his ſubjects.

While the French continued to ſupport the Genoeſe againſt the oppreſſed Corſicans, other nations were employed in promoting agriculture and commerce, particularly Denmark, where great encouragement was given to all ſuch as invented any new machine that could be of ſervice to the public.

In the Eaſt-Indies, all the petty princes look upon the Europeans as invaders; and, perhaps, the conduct of ſome of them has given too much reaſon for the uſe of ſuch an appellation. Whatever diſputes theſe eaſtern princes have among themſelves, yet no ſooner is one of them oppreſſed by any of the Europeans, than his cauſe becomes that of the whole, and they are ready to join in ſupport of their neighbour.

We have already ſeen how deſperate the affairs of the nabob, Meer Coſſim, were at the concluſion of the laſt year: and, much about the ſame time, died the brave major Adams, whoſe courage and conduct had long ſupported the affairs of the company. This event gave life to Meer Coſſim, who having received a powerful reinforcement, took the field: but major Monro, who ſucceeded to the command in chief of the company's forces, a brave officer, who, from his youth, had been brought up to arms, marched out to attack him.

The Indian troops, as is uſual on ſuch occaſions, were extremely numerous; but then they were but little acquainted with military diſcipline, and only fit to fight in detached parties, where they could have an opportunity of attacking the Engliſh by ſurprize. They were, however, ſtrongly encamped, when major Monro came up with them on the twenty-ſecond of October; ſo that not thinking it prudent to engage for the preſent, he halted within ſight of them, but ſtill out of the reach of their cannon. Next day, about nine in the morning, the major finding, that if he remained any longer inactive, the troops would be diſpirited, reſolved to form the line of battle, and attack the enemy in flank, for he could not do it in front, there being a deep moraſs before them. This movement had the deſired effect; for, in about three hours, the enemy began to give way, and left on the field of battle ſix thouſand killed, beſides one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, with their military cheſt, arms and ammunition.

Such was the ſituation of affairs in the Eaſt-Indies, when major Monro was recalled; and Sir Robert Fletcher, an officer brought up in the company's ſervice, was appointed to command in his room. He took the field as ſoon as he arrived; and marched about one hundred and fifty miles up the river Ganges, where he attacked ſeveral of the enemy's forts, and made the garriſons priſoners of war.

In America, great diſturbances happened on account of the ſtamp-act: for although the mother-country had expended great ſums of money in ſupporting the colonies, yet the inhabitants refuſed to be taxed by any beſides their own repreſentatives in their provincial aſſemblies. Scurrilous papers were publiſhed in moſt of the capital towns, reflecting on the adminiſtration; and, in general, mobs and tumults took place every where. The gentlemen who had been ſent over from England to act as officers of the ſtamp-duties, were ſeized by the populace, and obliged to ſwear that they would for ever renounce all connection with thoſe employments to which they had been appointed. Such of the natives in Boſton as were ſuſpected to have countenanced the act, had their houſes burnt down. The magiſtrates were treated in the moſt ignominious manner; and one gentleman, more obnoxious to them than the reſt, was forced to deliver up all his papers, ſo as to give evidence againſt himſelf; a circumſtance the more cruel, becauſe he only acted in a public character.

It is not to be ſuppoſed that theſe riots were carried on altogether by the populace, for undoubtedly many perſons of the higheſt rank in thoſe parts ſecretly fomented the diſturbances. This appeared evident ſoon after; for no ſooner had theſe diſaffected perſons ſeen the ſucceſs of the rioters, than they pulled off the maſk, and joined with them.

In the mean time, the governors of the provinces convened the aſſemblies, and propoſed that they ſhould, by ſome public act, make good the loſs of the ſufferers; but this they refuſed to do, although they condemned the conduct of the rioters, and offered rewards for apprehending them. This behaviour of the aſſemblies was approved of by their conſtituents, the freeholders, who gave them directions to oppoſe every meaſure that ſhould tend towards promoting the execution of the ſtamp-act, and to leave nothing undone in order to get it repealed; all which they promiſed to comply with, ſo that the governors knew not in what manner to act.

At laſt the aſſemblies went ſo far as to avow and acknowledge, that every thing done by the populace was conſiſtent with that duty they owed to their country. That a general union might be formed between the colonies, committees were eſtabliſhed to carry on a correſpondence with the leading members, and ſupport the common cauſe. Indeed, there was ſuch harmony among all the members of the different aſſemblies, that their eſtabliſhing committees was only a matter of form. The magiſtrates refuſed to act under a ſtatute that ſeemed injurious to their country, and the gentlemen of the law refuſed to plead unleſs the act was repealed. All public buſineſs was now at a ſtand; the courts of law were ſhut; and the merchants were afraid to ſend their goods to America, leſt they ſhould be deſtroyed: ſo that trade ſeemed at an end; and the total extinction of commerce, the only ſupport of the colonies, was on the point of being totally extinguiſhed.

Such was the diſtracted ſtate of our colonies in North-America, when, to the inexpreſſible regret of all thoſe who wiſhed well to their country, his royal highneſs William, duke of Cumberland, departed this life, at his houſe in Upper Groſvenor-ſtreet, on the laſt day of October, in the forty-fifth year of his age. This prince had been, from his moſt early youth, deſigned for the command of the army; and, while only a boy, he formed a company of noblemen and gentlemen's ſons, who, along with himſelf, were trained up in military exerciſes. Being properly qualified, he accepted of an enſign's commiſſion in the guards, and roſe from one ſtation to another, till at laſt he became the commander in chief. Ever attentive to the intereſts of his royal father's ſubjects, he freely expoſed his perſon in the moſt hazardous enterprizes during the war in Germany and Flanders; and, at the battle of Dettingen, when only arrived to the rank of a colonel, he commanded his own regiment, and received a wound on the thigh while advancing upon the enemy. His prudence and valour in ſuppreſſing an unnatural rebellion, are well known to the nation in general; ſo that nothing need be ſaid of it in this place. As a friend to merit in diſtreſs, he never neglected any opportunity of rewarding either officers or ſoldiers who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country. During the interval that took place between the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle and the breaking out of the war 1756, he conſtantly aſſiſted in the privy-council; and when ordered to take upon him the command of the allied army in Hanover, he chearfully obeyed, although he knew that the French forces were double his number. If his ſucceſs was not equal to his wiſhes, it was owing to the inferiority of his army; and when he thought proper to reſign all his public employments, he retired to a private ſtation, and ſpent the remainder of his life in giving proper encouragement to induſtry. Upon the whole, his highneſs was a wiſe counſellor, an able general, and indulgent maſter; and, what is ſtill more than any of theſe, he was a good man.

On the ſeventeenth of December, the parliament aſſembled; when his majeſty informed them of the diſturbances which had ariſen in America; and recommended to them to take it into their ſerious conſideration, by laying down ſome plan for ſupporting the dignity of government, without injuring the rights of the people. Addreſſes were preſented by both houſes; and the year cloſed with the death of prince Frederick William, his majeſty's youngeſt brother, who had been long in a declining way, and at laſt departed this life at Carleton-houſe on the twenty-ninth of December, in the ſixteenth year of his age.

A. D. 1766. This year opened with accounts from many parts of the world of people who had been long confined in chains of ſlavery, beginning to aſſert thoſe rights which belonged to them as men. The Georgians, a body of people who inhabit a vaſt tract of land near the Caſpian ſea, and are members of the Greek church, had been long oppreſſed by the Turks; and as their women are extremely handſome, they were obliged to ſend ſome of the moſt beautiful to Conſtantinople every year, to repleniſh the ſeraglio of the Grand Signior, as well as thoſe of the great officers of ſtate.

This was certainly a moſt ſhameful and unnatural tax, and therefore theſe people reſolved to ſhake it off. They were conducted in this undertaking by prince Heraclius, the deſcendant of one of their ſovereigns, a brave commander, and he defeated the Turks in ſeveral engagements; but not being properly ſupported by the Ruſſians, who were jealous of his power, he was obliged to drop the whole, and take ſhelter in the northern parts of Perſia.

In Egypt, and in the iſland of Cyprus, ſeveral inſurrections happened, in conſequence of the cruelties exerciſed on the inhabitants by the Turkiſh baſhaws, who ſeemed as if they had been ſent to thoſe countries, not to govern, but to deſtroy the people, by depriving them of the few privileges they had left. But an army of janiſaries being ſent againſt them, they were ſubdued, and once more obliged to ſubmit to the yoke of ſlavery.

In Poland, where the proteſtants, and thoſe of the Greek church, are called Diſſidents, a ſcheme was gradually opening to deluge that fertile country in blood. The pope had ſent a bull or order to the clergy, commanding them to procure an act, that no perſon ſhould be ſuffered to live in Poland who did not believe and profeſs the Roman Catholic religion, although both Greeks and proteſtants had been, by the moſt ſolemn treaties, endowed with thoſe privileges.

Remonſtrances in favour of thoſe diſſidents had been preſented by ſeveral courts, particularly that of Peterſburgh; but no regard having been paid to them by the diet or ſenate of Poland, an army of Ruſſians approached within a few miles of Warſaw. The Ruſſian general publiſhed a declaration, which was ſupported by another from Mr. Wroughton, the Engliſh ambaſſador; but the diet, inſtead of complying, declared, that they would adhere to the pope's bull, which had been publiſhed in all the churches by order of the prince primate.

The king ſaid all he could in favour of the diſſidents; and when he found that he could not prevail, he left the diet, thinking thereby to diſſolve it; but the prince primate, in virtue of his office as ſecond preſident, continued ſitting ſeveral days, till the debates ran ſo high, that all the members retired. In the mean time, the king, bleſſed with an open, enlarged mind, looked with abhorrence on all manner of perſecution: and although he made no attempt to change the eſtabliſhed religion of his country, yet he hated every thing that tended towards preventing a free inquiry into diſputed points.

During the month of March this year, great diſturbances happened in Spain, particularly in Madrid, Barcelona, and ſome other cities. The king of Spain had, from his early youth, been much addicted to French cuſtoms; and having introduced their dreſs into his court, he publiſhed an edict, commanding all his ſubjects to have their cloaths made in the ſame manner. Nothing is more inveterate than prejudice, or the long uſe of one faſhion in dreſs; and as the Spaniards had been, time immemorial, accuſtomed to their long cloaks, they looked upon the order as an infringement of their liberty. A ſignal having been given, ſome thouſands of men, all citizens, ſurrounded the palace, and were fired upon by the guards, who killed ſeveral of them. Their numbers, however, continued to increaſe, till towards evening, when a meſſenger was ſent to demand their reaſons for acting in ſuch a manner; upon which they cried out, that they meant no harm to the king, but that they would have the blood of the marquis of Squillacci. That nobleman, by birth an Italian, had been long prime miniſter to the king, and to him the people aſcribed all the innovations which had been made in their dreſs. The marquis was too ſenſible of his danger to remain any longer among a people who ſought his life; and therefore, having obtained permiſſion, he ſet out, with his lady and family, for Italy. His departure quieted the populace, who immediately diſperſed; but the king was ſo much offended at the loſs of his favourite, that he left Madrid, and reſided, during the remainder of the year, in the Eſcurial, about thirty miles diſtant.

The Engliſh affairs in the Eaſt-Indies were in a flouriſhing ſtate; for general Carnac, who commanded the company's forces, obtained a compleat victory over the Murrattas, a fierce people, whom Sujah Dowla had brought into the field. Sujah Dowla, with a ſpirit which would have done honour to an ancient Roman, reſolved to throw himſelf on the mercy of the conqueror; but firſt aſſiſted his friends in making their eſcape, being regardleſs of himſelf while they were ſafe. Accordingly, he ſurrendered to general Carnac, relying ſolely on his generoſity.

During theſe tranſactions, lord Clive arrived at Bengal, in the quality of governor of all the company's forts and ſettlements, with an unlimited power to act in what manner he pleaſed. This was, perhaps, the moſt flouriſhing year for the Eaſt-India company, for they acquired an immenſe treaſure; but that has proved fatal to this nation; for the riches in the Eaſt being brought into England, has extended luxury throughout every part of the nation. The rents of landed eſtates have been raiſed to ſupport it, by which the prices of all the neceſſaries of life have increaſed ſo faſt, that although no ſcarcity has taken place, yet many of out induſtrious poor are reduced to the greateſt hardſhips.

In England, the great object of national concern was the conduct of the Americans. On the fourteenth of January, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, where, in a long ſpeech, he adviſed the members to haſten their proceedings, leſt commerce ſhould ſuffer, and the public credit ſhould be injured. Petitions were, at the ſame time, preſented to parliament by the merchants of London, and almoſt all the trading towns in the nation, ſetting forth, that the ſtamp-act had done great injury to the Britiſh manufactures; and humbly praying, that they would take the whole into their conſideration, and grant ſuch relief as, in their wiſdom, ſhould appear reaſonable.

Great debates aroſe concerning the matter contained in theſe petitions, and two parties in the houſe of commons were extremely violent againſt each other. It is neceſſary to take notice, that this famous ſtamp-act had been ſtrongly ſupported by Mr. Grenville, firſt lord of the treaſury; but that gentleman having reſigned all his employments the preceding year, the marquis of Rockingham was appointed in his room.

Mr. Grenville, with all his friends, ſtood up in defence of the act: they urged, that nothing could be more reaſonable, than that thoſe who were the natural ſubjects of Great-Britain, nouriſhed by its manufactures, and protected by its armies and navies, ſhould contribute towards the ſupport of government, as well as thoſe who live in the mother-country. They added, that it was beneath the dignity of government to repeal laws, in order to pleaſe a factious people: and concluded by remarking, that if once ſuch an indulgence was granted, no laws would ever, for the future, become binding upon them; ſo that a ſtep of ſuch a nature would be an introduction to many evils, and, in the end, encourage the Americans to attempt to throw off all ſubjection to the Britiſh empire.

The ſame party dwelt long on the conceſſions which had been made by ſome of our princes to their ſubjects, and the fatal conſequences which flowed from them. They ſaid, that it had been acknowledged by the oppoſite party, that Britain had a legiſlative authority over the American colonies, and therefore, taxation being only a part of legiſlation, no man of common ſenſe, acquainted with the firſt principles of logic, could ſtand up in defence of the conduct of thoſe who had oppoſed the act.

On the other hand, the great principle contended for was, that all bodies corporate, eſtabliſhed by charters, writs, or patents from the crown, were never taxed but in their own aſſemblies: that the counties-palatine of Durham and Cheſter, which are held by preſcription, had never been taxed but in their own aſſemblies, till they were, by ſtatute, incorporated with the Engliſh parliament. Nay, they went farther, and inſiſted, that Wales, long after the reign of Edward I. was not taxed, nor did that practice commence till they were repreſented in parliament: that the dutchy of Lancaſter, although eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, had never been taxed till it ſent members; and the clergy, as a collective body, had continued to tax themſelves in their own convocations till the reign of Charles II. when they voluntarily gave up that privilege, and ſubmitted to be taxed with the other freeholders: that all the charters granted to the colonies are ſo many grants from the crown; and, conſidered in that light, all the rights and privileges of free-born ſubjects flowed down to them: that, in the interpretation of any diſpute concerning right, it was an invariable maxim in law to keep to that ſide where there were feweſt doubts remaining. Thus it was evident that the counties palatine, &c. had never been taxed till they were firſt repreſented; and as they held their privileges by grants from the crown, ſo the Americans were on the ſame footing, and ought to be conſidered in the ſame light.

Precedents were quoted from many paſſages in hiſtory, both ancient and modern; ſuch as the conduct of the Tyrians to the Carthaginians, who emigrated from them, and from a ſmall colony with a charter, they became a moſt flouriſhing commonwealth. That the colonies in America had been peopled by thoſe oppreſſed Britiſh ſubjects, who preferred liberty to ſlavery, even in the unhoſpitable deſerts of America. That as they were ſtill extremely poor, and as they had gone into thoſe parts to enjoy liberty, ſo nothing could be more unreaſonable than to attempt to deprive them of it. Many arguments were made uſe of out of Lock, Puffendorf, Harrington, Monteſquieu, and ſeveral other writers on natural law.

To all this it was replied by thoſe who oppoſed the repeal of the act, that the arguments brought in defence of the Americans, did not apply to any given propoſition that had been advanced in the debate. That the precedents brought from hiſtory actually defeated their own intention; for as to Wales, a conquered province, it was conſidered a great and valuable privilege, to ſuffer them to ſend repreſentatives to parliament, nor had they obtained till they firſt ſollicited for it, in the moſt earneſt manner. That they had been long cruelly oppreſſed by the lords of the marches, who under pretence of demanding ſubſidies for the crown, enriched themſelves while the poor inhabitants were ſtarving. That the counties palatine of Cheſter and Durham, ought not to be brought in as precedents; for inſtead of being held by charters, they were ſo by preſcription; and the earl of the one, with the biſhop of the other, although exempted from being taxed, either in the Wittenagemote, before the conqueſt, or the parliament after it, always contributed their quota towards ſupporting the government. That the dutchy of Lancaſter was entirely out of the queſtion; for it was a regality conſtituted in favour of John of Gaunt, fourth ſon of Edward III. according to the principles of the feudal law. That it was extremely diverting to hear men of learning, produce the account of Carthage, and mention a charter, while it remains a doubt whether letters were ſo much as known in the age that thoſe emigrants left Tyre, and as to the Americans being poor, it was confuted by daily experience.

Such were the arguments made uſe of by both parties, and the reader is left to judge for himſelf; for as long as there are prejudices remaining in the minds of men, the impartial hiſtorian will only relate facts without drawing inferences from them. The debates being finiſhed, a bill was brought in, which paſſed without the leaſt oppoſition, to ſecure the ſole dependence of the colonies on Great Britain, and then another bill was brought in for the repeal of the ſtamp-act, which alſo paſſed into a law.

On the ſixth of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers and put an end to the ſeſſions of parliament in a ſpeech, wherein he informed them, that with reſpect to his connection with foreign powers, every thing wore a peaceable aſpect; for as to the diſtractions in Poland, we were but very remotely concerned with, though he had done all in his power to bring about a reconciliation between the contending parties.

He told them, that the public buſineſs ſettled by them, had been of a very intricate, as well as an accumulated nature, and applauded their conduct in being ſo aſſiduous in the diſcharge of it. He added, that nothing could give him greater pleaſure than to hear that all his ſubjects, whether at home or abroad, were united in principles of harmony, ſo as to promote the good of each other, and concluded by telling them, that notwithſtanding the encreaſe of his family, he would attend to the ſtricteſt œconomy, in order to make the public expences as little as poſſible.

The miniſtry, at the head of whom was the marquis of Rockingham, were now in the height of glory; every ſcheme propoſed by them had been carried into execution; and (what perhaps will ſurprize all future ages) they were beloved by the people. No changes were ſuppoſed to take place, and none were wiſhed for; but the minds of ſovereigns, as well as private perſons, are equally ſubject to changes, and even for the ſame trifling reaſons.

For reaſons, that may be diſcovered by every ſenſible reader, the king, on the thirtieth of July, made the following changes in the miniſtry; changes that not only ſurpriſed the ſubjects of Britain, but likewiſe all the courts in Europe. The duke of Grafton was conſtituted firſt lord of the treaſury, in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; lord Cambden was ſent for from Northampton, where he was on the circuit, and created lord high-chancellor, in the room of the earl of Northington, made preſident of the council; the earl of Shelburne was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the duke of Richmond; Mr. Pitt was created earl of Chatham, and made lord privy-ſeal; and Mr. Townſhend was appointed chanchancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. Dowdeſwell. With reſpect to theſe changes it muſt be remembered, that for ſome years the miniſtry had been ſo often changed, that ſome ſuppoſed the people were not to be acquainted with any thing tranſacted at the helm of affairs; but the political writers brought every thing to light; for the diſcontented parties vented their ſpleen on each other.

Such was the ſtate of political affairs in England, when, on the firſt of October, the princeſs Caroline Matilda, youngeſt daughter of the late prince of Wales, and ſiſter to his majeſty, was married by proxy at St. James's, to the king of Denmark, and next day ſet out for Harwich. She was accompanied by her royal brother the duke of Glouceſter, and on the eighteenth of the ſame month ſhe arrived in ſafety at Altena, where ſhe was met by the king, and the nuptials were ſolemnized according to the form of the Lutheran church.

The parliament met on the eleventh of November, and there having been great complaints concerning the high price of proviſions and inſurrections in different parts of the country, his majeſty recommended the ſtate of the nations to both houſes, and deſired that they would, in their deliberations, fix on ſome plan for the relief of his diſtreſſed ſubjects.

He told them, that the diſcontents among the people had led them to commit many acts of violence on the reſt of their fellow ſubjects, from miſtaken notions that they had been the voluntary cauſe of all their ſufferings. That contrary to his own inclinations, but conſiſtent with the neceſſity he was under to ſupport the dignity of government, he had iſſued ſpecial commiſſions for the trials of the rioters, that the public peace might be preſerved, and the minds of the lower claſſes of people ſo much intimidated, that they would be afraid to offend. He added, that he had concluded a commercial treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia, which he hoped would be of great benefit to his ſubjects; and took notice of the marriage of his ſiſter to the king of Denmark, a circumſtance that would ſtrengthen the proteſtant intereſt. He concluded, by telling the commons that he confided in their wiſdom and fidelity for raiſing the ſupplies, and recommended unanimity to all the members.

As the miniſtry had been recently changed, great oppoſition was made in the houſe to every thing propoſed by adminiſtration. Nay ſome of the diſcarded adherents went ſo far as to attempt to paliate, and even excuſe the rioters, who had riſen in different parts of the country. However, it was agreed upon by the greateſt majority in both houſes, that addreſſes of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, and then they adjourned till after the holidays.

A. D. 1767. The firſt object that attracted the notice of parliament this ſeſſions, was the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company, which was now become extremely rich, and actually exerciſed a ſovereign authority over their ſettlements. To all wiſe miniſters ſuch a circumſtance muſt have been very alarming; and therefore a committee was appointed to examine into the affair. The charter of the company was ordered to be produced, and that a perfect knowledge might be obtained of every thing relating to their tranſactions, they were obliged to deliver up to the houſe the originals of ſuch treaties as they had entered into with the princes in the Eaſt-Indies; and alſo an account of all the expences incurred by the government for the ſupport of the company.

This was a moſt mortifying affair for the proprietors of Eaſt-India ſtock; and what was ſtill worſe, all theſe papers were printed and publiſhed. The queſtion ſtated by adminiſtration was, "What right "had the Eaſt-India company to territorial juriſ"diction?"

By their charter they were even excluded from making any conqueſts; and yet it was certain that they had ſubdued ſeveral of the princes in India, and annexed their dominions to their own ſettlements. It was urged further, that ſuch powers veſted in a corporate body of merchants was inconſiſtent with the nature of government, derogatory to the dignity of the crown, and injurious to the generality of the ſubjects. That if the government was to ſupport them, then all thoſe acquiſitions of territory became the property of the crown, otherwiſe a principle would take place ſimilar to that in the feudal law, where regalities were eſtabliſhed, and the chief enjoyed a commutative juriſdiction with the ſovereign. That ſuch practices would contribute towards the promoting confuſion among all ranks of ſubjects, and might in the end lead us back to a ſtate of barbarity, equal to that in which our predeceſſors were five hundred years ago.

On the other hand, thoſe who contended for the rights of the company, argued in the following manner. They ſaid, that the words of the charter were general, and therefore the notion of acquiſitions was implied by inferences drawn from conſequences, without an aſſigned ſpecification. That by ſuch a chain of reaſoning, all the new ſettlements made in America, beyond thoſe that were ſpecified in the charters, might be claimed by the crown, although it was evident, that they were private property. That people who went to ſettle in foreign parts, eſpecially among uncultivated ſavages, were obliged, for their own ſafety, to extend the bounds of their territories; and if the government is at ſome trifling expence in ſupporting them, it is no more than what they owe to the ſubjects in general. It was further urged, that if the crown had any claim on the company, the courts of law were open, where there was not the leaſt doubt but juſtice would be done to all parties; and as the houſe of commons was not a court of judicature, ſo it had no right to meddle with points of law, nor could it decide on any legal privileges. That if ever ſuch an event ſhould take place, as that of the commons aſſuming a power to judge in matters of law, it would prove fatal to the ſubjects in general, who would chuſe that their reſpective properties ſhould be intruſted in other hands.

The diſputes were carried on with great warmth by both parties, and the reſult was, that the company ſhould, during the ſpace of two years enſuing, pay a certain ſum to the government; and that no dividend of their ſtock ſhould be made without the conſent of a general court of proprietors.

On the twenty-fourth of June his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſions of parliament, and on the ſeventeenth of September following, his royal highneſs the duke of York, who had gone abroad in order to make the tour of Italy, died at Monaco, a ſmall diſtrict a little beyond Provence.

With reſpect to public affairs on the continent of Europe, an event took place little expected, and which ſurprized moſt people. It is well known that Italy, once the ſeat of learning, has been for many ages the mother and nurſe of ſuperſtition; and from thence originated all thoſe ridiculous ceremonies that debaſed the chriſtian religion, and made it reſemble the groſſeſt paganiſm, for ſuch is the nominal worſhip performed in popiſh churches, that a ſtranger would conſider it in much the ſame light as the idolatry of the antient heathens.

For ſome time popery had been loſing ground in thoſe countries where it is by law eſtabliſhed, and encreaſing where it was prohibited, owing to the diſgrace into which the jeſuits had brought themſelves. That ſociety had been eſtabliſhed above two hundred years, and in that time had riſen to ſuch fame, that they became objects of jealouſy, and even reſentment to the other orders. It is true, they were become ſo affluent that even princes might have looked upon them as dangerous rivals; but that was not the ſole cauſe of their ruin. It had been a conſtant practice with princes, and other great men, to make them their confeſſors; and it is well known, that he who acts the part of a confeſſor to a prince, may, with propriety, be conſidered as his prime miniſter. All ſecrets had been truſted with them, and as ſome of them were, at the ſame time, confeſſors to thoſe in oppoſite intereſts, jealouſies took place; and the king of Portugal, having been attacked in his carriage in conſequence of a plan laid by theſe fathers, reſolved to baniſh them out of his dominions. This happened ſeveral years before the period we are now treating off, and Spain followed the example of Portugal, by baniſhing them out of all their dominions, whether in Europe or America.

One would have imagined that they would have found an aſylum in Italy, and it is true, they did ſo for ſome time; but during the former part of this year, they were baniſhed from Naples and Parma, and all their eſtates confiſcated. Under various characters, ſuch as thoſe of tutors, clerks, ſurgeons, &c. many of them have ſettled in proteſtant countries; but it is to be hoped, that parents and guardians will take care to prevent youth from being ſeduced by them.

In Ruſſia, the empreſs had ſummoned all the learned men in her empire to aſſemble at Moſcow, in order to compile a code of laws, which was the more neceſſary, as many of the provinces conſiſted of ſubjects governed by different laws, and theſe frequently claſhing with each other contributed towards injuring claimants to private property, and retarded the regular courſe of diſtributive juſtice.

In Poland, the diet once more aſſembled, but as it was impoſſible to bring the contending parties to an agreement, the nobles, who were at the head of the diſſidents, formed themſelves into a ſeparate body for their own preſervation.

The attention of all the people in Europe was, this year, directed to Corſica, an iſland in the Mediterranean, almoſt adjoining to the iſland of Sardinia. It is extremely fertile and populous, and ſome centuries ago, had been given by the pope to the republic of Piſa; but the Genoeſe took it, and for many years treated the inhabitants in the moſt arbitrary and cruel manner. The ſpirit of liberty, however, was not extinct, it wanted only the breath of a hero to kindle it; and ſuch a one was found in the perſon of the famous Paoli, a native of the iſland, but had travelled into other countries, where he had learned the art of war. The prudence and valour of that hero will be tranſmitted to the lateſt ages, but we ſhall ſee in the ſubſequent part of this work, that overpowered by numbers, he was obliged to abandon the iſland.

On the twenty-fourth of November the parliament met, and was opened by his majeſty, who told the members that he had aſſembled them at ſo early a period, that they might have time to deliberate with ſteadineſs and judgment; and, in particular, he recommended to them the ſtate of the nation with reſpect to the price of proviſions.

The firſt, and indeed the principal ſubject engaged the attention of both houſes was of ſuch a nature, that nothing equal to it happened ſince the revolution.

tion. The dreadful hardſhips to which the poor had been reduced by the exorbitant price of proviſions, became matter of ſerious conſideration; and petitions having been preſented to his majeſty during the receſs of parliament, a proclamation was iſſued, prohibiting the exportation of corn for a limited time. It is certain, that as there was an act of parliament, allowing the free exportation of corn, while at or under a certain price, the diſpenſing with it by proclamation was unconſtitutional, eſpecially as the parlialiament might have been aſſembled, and a bill brought in to ſet aſide the former act. But if the diſpenſing power was this once exerciſed, certainly it was to promote the moſt benevolent of all purpoſes, namely, that of alleviating the diſtreſſes of the poor. However, as ſuch a practice had been ſolemnly condemned at the revolution, and leſt it ſhould ſet a moſt dangerous precedent for ſucceeding princes to copy after, a bill was brought in and paſſed into a law, declaring the meaſure illegal; but at the ſame time to indemnify all thoſe who had acted either in making or obeying the proclamation. The debates on this bill ran very high, and happy was it for the miniſtry that their intention in iſſuing the proclamation was good; for it was inſiſted on by the adverſe party, that no excuſe, not even abſolute neceſſity could be pleaded in favour of thoſe who promoted the diſpenſing with an act of parliament.

Thoſe who ſpoke in defence of the miniſtry, urged the opinion of Mr. Locke, who ſays, it is ridiculous to ſuppoſe that there ſhould be a ſingle ſtate in the world, where the prince had not, on extraordinary occaſions, a right to provide for his diſtreſſed ſubjects: nay that it was his duty to do ſo, for otherwiſe he could not, with any degree of propriety, be called the father of his people. They maintained, that this doctrine was not contrary to the ſecurity of the civil conſtitution, or to the ſpirit of liberty, ſince they admitted that it could be legally exerted only in caſes of the greateſt neceſſity during the receſs of parliament, and when parliament cannot conveniently be aſſembled.

To this it was anſwered, that the doctrine of neceſſity was the foundation of all the troubles in the reign of Charles I. eſpecially in the affair of ſhip-money, when it was pretended there was a ſtate neceſſity for it. That no diſcretionary power was left in the crown, but what was at the ſame time limited by ſome act of parliament; ſo that the crown could never diſpenſe with poſitive laws. They urged farther, that to ſuſpend an act, was but another name for a temporary repeal, and if the king could repeal acts, then he could make them. But the parliament did not allow this diſpenſing power to lodge any where but in the three branches; namely, king, lords and commons; becauſe, though it might be once exerciſed for the good of the ſubjects, yet ſuch were the paſſions of men, that it would more frequently be proſtituted to the baſeſt purpoſes. That if the exigences of the caſe required it, let the parliament be immediately aſſembled, and the matter laid before them, for if the king can break through one law, he can break through all. Upon the whole, it was ſaid, that if the doctrine of ſuſpenſion, on the plea of ſtate neceſſity, was admitted as conſtitutional, the revolution could be called nothing but a ſucceſsful rebellion, a lawleſs and wicked invaſion of the rights of the crown, and James II. was actually robbed.

Such were the arguments made uſe of by both parties, and certain it is, that the miniſtry had no right to diſpenſe with a ſtatute, ſeeing they might have aſſembled the parliament for that purpoſe. But candour will draw a veil where the action aroſe from motives of benevolence, although the means made uſe of might not be altogether conſtitutional.

A. D. 1768. The public buſineſs having been diſpatched in parliament, the king went to the houſe on the tenth of March, and having thanked the commons for their generouſly granting the ſupplies for the year, deſired them to preſerve peace among their neighbours in their counties and towns, eſpecially during the next general election. He then prorogued the parliament to the laſt day of March; but on the twelfth a proclamation was iſſued, whereby they were diſſolved. At the ſame time writs were iſſued for electing new members, and in many parts of the country the conteſts between the different candidates ran ſo high, that many ſcandalous actions were committed.

The new parliament met on the eleventh of May, and the commons having choſen Sir John Cuſt for their ſpeaker, the lord chancellor Cambden opened the ſeſſion by virtue of a commiſſion from his majeſty. Both houſes preſented loyal addreſſes to his majeſty, beſeeching him to put the laws in execution againſt all thoſe concerned in riots or tumults. The growing price of proviſions had driven many of the lower claſſes of people to a ſtate of diſtraction, and ſeveral irregularities had been committed, eſpecially in Spital-fields; where many poor families did not only ſtruggle under the dearth of proviſions, but were alſo deſtitute of work. Undoubtedly the keeping the price of proviſions as low as poſſible, is the grand object that all government ought to have in view; for by attending to that, commerce is encouraged, and the people are kept in proper ſubjection to the laws; but when ſuch things are neglected, all runs into the utmoſt confuſion, which forbodes the ruin of a ſtate.

Nothing further was done this ſeſſion, beſides chuſing the proper committees, and then the parliament was prorogued. The affairs in England being not very intereſting, we muſt now conſider ſuch tranſactions as happened on the continent of Europe, eſpecially the north and eaſt, where war had broke out between the great empires of Turky and Ruſſia. The Ruſſians, who a century ago, were no better than barbarians, are now become a moſt powerful people; and in many parts of that vaſt empire, learning is cultivated, and commerce encouraged. So rapidly indeed have the people in Ruſſia proceeded in the cultivation of their intellectual faculties, that there are but two things wanting to make them the moſt powerful people in the world, namely, a ſettlement on the Black Sea, and the reſignation of all claims to thoſe extenſive countries in Aſia, which border on China, and over which they have no more than a nominal ſovereignty. By the former, they would be able to extend their commerce with great facility along the ſhores of the Mediterranean; and by the latter, they would be relieved from the neceſſity of keeping up too great an army to govern barbarous nations not worthy of their notice, and unable to repay the expence. Like the Roman empire at the death of Trojan, Ruſſia is too large to be governed by one head; and however willing ſovereigns may be to give up their claims to nominal territories, yet we are aſſured from hiſtory, and convinced by daily experience, that an empire too large is never well governed. The empreſs of Ruſſia was ſenſible of this, and as ſhe had nothing more at heart than the civilizing of her people, by compleating the great plan laid down by the Czar Peter, ſo ſhe conſidered the diſtreſſes in Poland, and the conduct of the French in ſtirring up the Turks againſt that unhappy country, as a favourable opportunity for her to extend her conqueſts to the Black Sea, and from thence to Conſtantinople.

What gave great countenance to this ſcheme, was the religion of the Ruſſian empire. From the times of the emperor Juſtinian, who flouriſhed about the middle of the ſixth century, down to the middle of the fourteenth, the chriſtians called Greeks, had ſettled themſelves and propagated their religion from the eaſtern extremity of Dalmatia to the Helleſpont, and in all the iſlands of the Mediterranean that lay eaſtward of Malta. They were likewiſe very numerous in the Leſſer Aſia; and from Armenia and Georgia, their ſentiments had been inculcated among the Ruſſians, ſo that the inhabitants of that vaſt empire were of the ſame religion with the greateſt part of the inhabitants of Turky in Europe. The Greeks, throughout every part of the Turkiſh empire, had been long conſidered in the ſame light as if they had been ſlaves; and the oppreſſions they groaned under, from the tyranny of their inhuman governors, the baſhaws of the provinces, made them wiſh for any change, eſpecially ſuch a one as might be in their favour.

All theſe things being duly conſidered by the empreſs of Ruſſia and her miniſtry, it was agreed upon that her army ſhould march into Poland, under pretence of aſſiſting the diſſidents. The regular troops of Poland were then under the command of count Branicki, maſter of the ordnance; but many regiments deſerted, and joined the diſſidents, who were now become ſo ſtrong, that they took the field. Scarce a day paſſed without ſkirmiſhes between the contending parties; and while the diet of Poland was ſitting, the Ruſſians entered the ſenate-houſe, and carried off ſuch of the members as were moſt averſe to their meaſures. Confederacies were formed every where, according to the inclinations of the parties; but a body of them, under the marſhal Potochi, was defeated by a party of the Ruſſians, and obliged to ſeek ſhelter in Turky. The Ruſſians purſued the fugitives into Moldavia; which ſo exaſperated the baſhaw of that province, that he ſent an expreſs to the Grand Signior, who returned for anſwer, that the Ruſſian general had infringed the faith of treaties, and inſiſted upon his making ſatisfaction. This, however, he would by no means comply with, and contented himſelf with pleading ignorance of the bounds of the Turkiſh empire; after which he retired, while Potochi haraſſed his rear, and cut off many of his men. Potochi ſoon after having gathered together the remains of his army, marched through Moldavia, and from thence into Poland, where he was joyfully received by his friends, and invited to join a ſtrong confederacy that had been formed at Bar. There they were attacked by the Ruſſians, and a moſt bloody battle enſued, in which the confederates came off conquerors, though not without conſiderable loſs.

But this was a victory from which the confederates reaped but few advantages; for the Ruſſian army, under general Apraxin, having attacked them, they were defeated, and above four thouſand killed on the ſpot. The town and caſtle of Bar were then given up to the Ruſſians, who ſeized all the arms and ammunition; and ſo vaſt were the riches depoſited in theſe places, that the prizes to the private ſoldiers were near a thouſand pounds ſterling each.

At Cracovia, an ancient city in Poland, the confederates made a moſt vigorous defence, which was owing to the king having ſent a moſt ſupplicating letter to the Ruſſian general, not to demoliſh the houſes of the inhabitants. However, a train of heavy artillery was ſent from Warſaw, upon which the place was taken by ſtorm, and many of the inhabitants put to the ſword.

It might reaſonably have been thought, that theſe diſtreſſes in Poland would have brought their great nobles to hearken to the voice of reaſon; but they were all to no purpoſe; for they ſeldom met together to tranſact public affairs, without coming to blows, and, on ſuch occaſions, much blood was ſpilt. The Greeks in the Morea having taken up arms, were defeated by a party of the Turks; and ſuch as were taken priſoners ſuffered the moſt cruel tortures; all which furniſhed an excuſe for the Ruſſians to act with more vigour againſt the confederates in Poland, who had not only been inſtigated to take up arms by the Turks, but were alſo ſecretly ſupported by them, otherways they could never have been able to hold out ſo long as they did.

The connection which Great-Britain hath long had with Ruſſia, of a commercial nature, makes us more than ordinarily concerned in every thing relating to that extenſive empire. It is certain that the Ruſſians could not long conceal their real intentions; and therefore the divan, or council of the Grand Signior, propoſed that the ambaſſador from Peterſburg ſhould be impriſoned. This was a flagrant breach of the law of nations, which grants protection to the perſons of ambaſſadors: but the Turks are either too ignorant, or too obſtinate to pay any regard to ſuch ſacred rights. This occaſioned an open declaration of war by the empreſs of Ruſſia; and, from a maniſeſto which was tranſmitted to her ambaſſadors at foreign courts, it appears that ſhe imagined all thoſe in alliance with her would give her every aſſiſtance ſhe ſhould require; but this was what they would by no means comply with.

In the mean time, the empreſs raiſed a great army from all the different parts of the empire; and one out of ten of the regular troops was draughted, to teach the new recruits military diſcipline; for ſome of them had been brought from the banks of the Wolga, where fire-arms had ſcarce ever been ſeen.

While theſe preparations were making in Ruſſia, hoſtilities were renewed between the Ruſſians and the confederates in Poland, and many bloody battles were fought; but the latter not being united, and leſs numerous than the former, were moſt commonly defeated with great loſs. In one of theſe engagements, the Ruſſians purſued a party of the confederates to the other ſide of the Boryſtenes, a river which divides Poland from the Turkiſh dominions; and the fugitives having taken ſhelter in the town of Balta, in Leſſer Tartary, the Ruſſians took it by ſtorm, and indiſcriminately put all to the ſword whom they found in arms, without ſo much as enquiring whether they were Turks, Tartars, or confederates. Nay, it is even aſſerted, that near a thouſand women and children were barbarouſly murdered, which is not to be wondered at, when we conſider what numbers of ſavage irregulars always attend the Ruſſian armies.

This act of hoſtility enraged the Turks to the higheſt degree; and as their grand vizier, or prime miniſter, was of a very pacific diſpoſition, he was depoſed, and another appointed in his room. At the ſame time, a maniſeſto was given to ſuch of the European ambaſſadors as were then at Conſtantinople. But it was one of the moſt fooliſh that ever was read: it ſets forth, that the king of Poland was not fit to reign, becauſe he was not of a royal family; altho' it is well known that the Poles had, time immemorial, elected one of their own nobles to be their king, nor had that practice been ever ſet aſide till the death of the famous Sobieſki, in 1697, when Auguſtus, elector of Saxony, was, by his intrigues, elected in his room.

The preparations made by the Turks for war, was, in ſome meaſure, ſimilar to the conduct of Darius, when he went to meet Alexander the Great. The officers ſeemed to vie with each other in making the grandeſt proviſion of tents and equipages, and furniſhing themſelves with large ſums of money: all which was joyful news to the Ruſſians, who doubted not but they ſhould be able to ſhare in the ſpoils. Great bodies of troops from Egypt, Syria, and all parts of the Leſſer Aſia, were daily brought over the Helleſpont; but many diſorders having been committed by them in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople, an order was iſſued, commanding all the new Aſiatic troops to croſs at the Dardanelles, where veſſels would be ready to carry them to Gallipoly, on the oppoſite ſhore of the Black Sea. All the Greeks throughout the empire were ordered to deliver up their arms; but ſome of them having refuſed to comply, the janiſaries attacked them with their ſwords, and ſome on both ſides were killed.

The eyes of all Europe were fixed on the emperor of Germany, to ſee what part he would take in the war: for although there had been long a natural enmity between his family and the Turks, yet he knew that the Ruſſians were already too powerful to need any aſſiſtance, nor did he deſire that they ſhould ever ſettle on the Black Sea. However, the young emperor attended ſo ſtrictly to the raiſing recruits to fill up his regiments, that many began to imagine that he intended to take the field; and it was even given out, that he was greatly offended becauſe the Ruſſians did not depart from Poland.

The king of Pruſſia, ever attentive to his own intereſt, did not remain idle; for his regiments were all completed, that he might be ready, on the firſt emergency, to take the field. He enliſted as many foreigners in his ſervice as he could procure, leſt agriculture ſhould be neglected in his dominions. Nor was he leſs attentive to the domeſtic ſafety of his country; for he gave encouragement to all thoſe who promoted manufactures; and rewards were beſtowed on the widows and children of ſuch as had been killed during the war.

The French, although profeſſed Roman Catholics, pay but little regard to the pope; for this year they took from him the province of Vanaiſſan, with the fine city of Avignon. It is true, the pope thundered out his bulls and curſes; but however terrible they might have been in former times, they were now very little regarded.

During the month of Auguſt this year, the French concluded a treaty with the republic of Genoa, of a very extraordinary nature, and ſuch as ought to have been oppoſed by all the maritime ſtates in Europe. The brave Corſicans ſtill continued to defend thoſe rights which the Genoeſe ſought to deprive them of; and the latter deſpairing of ever bringing them into ſubjection, agreed to give up that valuable iſland to the French king, upon condition of his ſending an army thither to ſubdue the people. It was really ſurpriſing that other nations ſhould have ſuffered ſuch a treaty to be put in execution; for if a war ſhould break out, the French will have an opportunity of ſending a ſwarm of privateers from Corſica, and to this iſland they could bring their prizes without being obliged to ſail to Marſeilles; ſo that the trade along the ſouth and weſt coaſt of Italy would be wholly their own.

Such was the ſtate of affairs on the continent, when the attention of the Engliſh miniſtry was directed to America, where ſeveral diſturbances had happened on account of ſome duties having been laid on glaſs, ſalt, and ſome other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the ſtamp-act would have given ſome ſatisfaction to theſe people, but they ſtill inſiſted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themſelves.

At Boſton, the people met in a large body, and entered into ſeveral reſolutions not to import any goods of a ſuperfluous nature, but to attend to the ſtricteſt œconomy, both in dreſs and furniture. A ſubſcription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the eſtabliſhment of new ones. This was done to elude the payment of the duties upon ſuch articles as ſhould be ſent from England; and, at the ſame time, an aſſociation of gentlemen from all the old colonies was formed, in order to propoſe the moſt likely means to be uſed in preventing Engliſh acts of parliament from being put in force there, or in any other of the American provinces, or the Weſt-Indies.

The freeholders, and, in general, all the inhabitants of Maſſachuſet's Bay, had placed the greateſt confidence in their repreſentatives, and there was a continual conteſt between them and their governor. The earl of Shelburne had ſent over a letter to the governor, complaining of theſe abuſes, and it was read in the open aſſembly of the repreſentatives. This occaſioned moſt violent debates; and ſome of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the governor had miſrepreſented their conduct to the miniſtry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on that ſubject, vindicating themſelves, and throwing the whole blame on the governor. At the ſame time, the merchants of Boſton ordered their agent to repreſent to the lords of the treaſury, that unleſs theſe duties, which had occaſioned ſo much miſchief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be deſtroyed, as they ſeemed to them contrary to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, and inconſiſtent with their charter. Theſe repreſentations occaſioned the eſtabliſhment of a new officer, who was to act as ſecretary of ſtate for the colonies in America; and the firſt perſon made choice of was the earl of Hillſborough, at that time firſt lord of trade. The firſt thing done by his lordſhip, was to ſend circular letters to the governors of the provinces, informing them, that his majeſty was highly diſpleaſed at the conduct of the people, as it was apt to create confuſion, and throw every thing into the utmoſt diſorder. He ſaid, that their conduct in oppoſing the legiſlative power of Great-Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to ſuch practices, the government would be overturned, and no regard paid to the laws. He concluded by recommending to them to preſerve the public peace, by puniſhing all diſorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere oppoſition in words, or in ſcandalous libels, they were to treat them with contempt.

Governor Barnard had diſſolved the aſſembly of repreſentatives, and new ones being choſen, it was inſiſted on by him, that they ſhould make a public act to diſapprove of the conduct of the late aſſembly. This was going too far; becauſe, unleſs repreſentatives are left free to act according to the will and orders of their conſtituents, they do not deſerve the name. They deſired to ſee a copy of the governor's inſtructions, which was granted them, and, to their ſurprize, they found, that in caſe they refuſed to comply, they were to be diſſolved, and an account of their conduct ſent to England, in order to be laid before the next ſeſſions of parliament.

This ſet the whole aſſembly in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to paſs a cenſure on the conduct of the laſt aſſembly, ninety-two voted againſt it, and no more than ſeventeen for it. The reſt of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example; while combinations were formed almoſt every where not to take any goods from England, except ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary.

The diſcontents among the people of Boſton now broke out into open violence: for a ſhip having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any regard to the new laws by which the new cuſtoms were to be regulated, the officers made a ſignal to the Romney man of war, who ſent her boats; and having cut down the maſts of the trading veſſel, hawled her along-ſide of the king's ſhip. This was ſo ſeverely reſented by the populace, that they roſe in great numbers, demoliſhed the houſes of the cuſtom-houſe officers, and laying hold of the commiſſioner's boat, dragged it on ſhore, and then ſet it on fire.

While theſe diſorders continued in the town, the governor diſſolved the aſſembly; but that had not the deſired effect, for the diſturbances increaſed every day, ſo that two regiments were ſent over from Ireland to ſupport the civil power. Their place of rendezvous was to be at Hallifax, in Nova-Scotia; and no ſooner had the people of Boſton received news that they were landed at that place, than they met, and choſe a preſident among themſelves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reaſon, or with what view, his majeſty's forces were to be ſent among them. They deſired, at the ſame time, that a general aſſembly might be ſummoned to meet; but he refuſed to give them any ſatisfactory anſwer, and only told them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and ſubmit quietly to the laws. He added, that as they ſeemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he muſt freely tell them, that unleſs they ſubmitted to the government, he ſhould be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this time he refuſed to receive any meſſages from them; upon which they ſent a long detail of their grievances to London, in order to be laid before the miniſtry. In the mean time, the tranſports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halifax, and were quartered in the houſes of townſmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor that they ſhould have barrack proviſions, ſo as to be as little burthenſome to the people as poſſible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general ſatisfaction to ſuch of the people as were moderate in their ſentiments; but notwithſtanding, a great majority were ſtill diſcontented. They could not behold without jealouſy an armed force quartered amongſt them in time of peace; for, with reſpect to their late combinations, they conſidered them as efforts to maintain their freedom.

The domeſtic peace of England, during this ſummer, which was not interrupted by any incident but one, which will hereafter be taken notice of, induced the king of Denmark to viſit his royal brother-in-law, our ſovereign. He was attended by moſt of his great officers of ſtate, and the utmoſt reſpect was paid to him by all ranks of people. But nothing leſs than the moſt unbounded diſſipation ſeemed to have taken place. His Daniſh majeſty gave orders for a maſquerade, which was one of the moſt magnificent ever ſeen in England; and while the preparations for it were going on, he viſited Cambridge, where he was elegantly entertained in the hall of Trinity College. From thence he proceeded to York, Leeds, and Mancheſter; and, on his return to London, coming through Oxford, he was met by the whole univerſity in proceſſion. When he came to the ſenate-houſe, the public orator complimented him in a moſt elegant Latin ſpeech, to which his majeſty replied in the ſame language. He was then preſented with a diploma, as doctor of the civil and canon laws, and walked in his honorary robes along with the doctors and regents. In the beginning of October, his majeſty left England; and, much about the ſame time, ſeveral changes took place in the Engliſh miniſtry; for certain it is, that the political ſtate of this country had, for ſeveral years, been of a very fluctuating nature.

In the Eaſt-Indies, during the latter end of the laſt, and the beginning of this year, things began to aſſume a new form; and it was even feared that a revolution would take place much to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, whoſe ſtock was now advanced to a ſurpriſing height. Hyder Ally, a perſon who had ſerved ſome time as a common ſoldier, having received ſome affront from his officers, left the army, and raiſed a choſen band of followers, with a view of driving the Engliſh out of all their ſettlements in that part of the world. Although brought up in the moſt humble ſtation, yet, like Tamerlane, or Caius Marius, he had all the qualities of a great general, which were only obſcured for want of a proper opportunity of diſplaying them to public view.

Such was the character of the man with whom the Engliſh had now to contend, and it muſt be acknowledged, that it required the greateſt ſkill to oppoſe him. He had conquered ſeveral provinces on the coaſt of Malabar, and, upon the whole, was conſidered as one of the moſt formidable princes in the eaſt. He was ſenſible, however, that the Eaſt-India company would be ſo powerfully ſupported, that policy muſt be added to force, otherwiſe he ſhould never be able to accompliſh his ſchemes. Accordingly, he brought over the Nizam of the Decan to his intereſt; and having raiſed a large body of forces, prepared to take the field. Colonel Smith, in the company's ſervice, was ſent to oppoſe this formidable alliance; and a moſt deſperate engagement enſued, in which Hyder Ally diſcovered all the courage and conduct of the braveſt general. He made his diſpoſitions with ſo much prudence, that it was no eaſy matter to attack him; ſo that colonel Smith, in order to avoid the force of his cannon, which galled the company's troops on the right, marched to a riſing ground on the left, and ſo turned his lines. The Aſiatic general rode from one place to another, to encourage his men; but at laſt they gave way, and the Engliſh continued purſuing them with great ſlaughter. All their cannon and ammunition fell into the hands of the Engliſh, beſides a vaſt quantity of treaſure; and the Nizam perceiving the danger he was in from his connections with Hyder Ally, made peace with the company. This, however, did not put an end to the war; for Hyder Ally finding himſelf deſerted by the Nizam, transferred the ſeat of war into a mountainous part of the country, where it was extremely difficult to attack him, as he was well acquainted with all the paſſages and defiles, and could defend himſelf even againſt ſuperiority of numbers.

During the latter part of this year, the war was carried on with great violence in Corſica: for altho' the French had landed there with a numerous army, the brave iſlanders diſputed the ground with them inch by inch. Paoli had ſome hopes of aſſiſtance from England, and, for that purpoſe, ſent notice of his diſtreſs to our miniſtry by one Mr. Boſwell, a young gentleman with whom he had become acquainted while on his travels: but no aſſiſtance being given him, he had nothing to depend on beſides the juſtice of his cauſe and the bravery of his countrymen. At firſt, the French obtained ſome conſiderable advantages; but the Corſicans killed ſuch vaſt numbers of them in ſtraggling parties, that had they not been reinforced by freſh ſuccours continually ſent to them, the whole army that firſt landed would have been totally cut off. The Corſicans concealed themſelves in buſhes and caves near the roads where the enemy were to paſs, and galled them ſo much, that many of them deſerted, while ſuch as fell into the hands of the Corſicans as priſoners were inſtantly put to death. Some perſons may be apt to blame the conduct of the Corſicans on this occaſion, as inconſiſtent with the law of nations; but whoever does ſo, muſt be unacquainted with the peculiarity of their circumſtances. They had been ſo much oppreſſed by the Genoeſe, that they had, conſiſtent with the opinions of the beſt writers on natural law, aſſerted their own freedom; and when the republic of Genoa found that they could not again reduce them to a ſtate of ſubjection, they gave them up to the French, as if they had been a parcel of ſheep or oxen. The French, upon their landing in the iſland, commanded all the inhabitants to lay down their arms, and take an oath of allegiance to their ſovereign, otherwiſe they were to be treated as rebels. Thus theſe innocent people, knowing that no mercy was to be ſhewn to ſuch of themſelves as were taken priſoners, reſolved to treat the French in the ſame manner, and ſell their lives and liberty as dear as poſſible. Such was the ſtate of the Corſicans; and their putting the French priſoners to death was no more than an act of retaliation, which ſtands juſtified by Grotius, Budin, Locke, and Puffendorff.

Paoli, who ſtill hoped for aſſiſtance from England, as well as from ſome of the other European powers, called an aſſembly of the Corſican chiefs, and aſked their opinion concerning the moſt proper methods to be uſed in the proſecution of the war. He laid before them all the papers which the French had cauſed to be diſtributed throughout the iſland; but no ſooner did the chiefs perceive that they were looked upon as vaſſals to the crown of France, than they tore them into a thouſand pieces.

Although this campaign was but ſhort, yet ſo great was the loſs the French ſuſtained, that, notwithſtanding the new reinforcements which were daily ſent them, they were on the point of being totally routed. Adjoining to Corſica are ſome ſmall iſlands; and as the harbours of them were ſafe and commodious, ſo the Corſican privateers prevented, in a great meaſure, the enemy from receiving ſuch ſupplies as had been ſent them from France. This induced the French, in the month of November this year, to embark a conſiderable body of forces on board thirteen tranſports, in order to attack theſe ſmall iſlands.

Their firſt attack was made on the iſland of Pietra; but although they made good their landing, they were repulſed with great loſs by a few Corſicans, who, animated by the love of liberty, fought like lions. From thence the French proceeded to Iſola Roſſa, another iſland, where the Corſicans kept their magazines, and attacked it with great fury. At firſt the Corſicans were driven from their poſts; but no ſooner had they recollected themſelves, and recovered from their firſt ſurprize, than they faced about, and not only recovered the poſts they had loſt, but drove the enemy, with great ſlaughter, back to their ſhips. Above nine hundred of the French were killed in this fruitleſs expedition, and their general began to deſpair of ever taking the iſland. But we muſt now return to Britain.

The Engliſh miniſtry were thrown into a little confuſion by the death of Mr. Townſhend, chancellor of the exchequer, a gentleman of great natural parts, univerſal erudition, and a perfect knowledge of the conſtitution. Indeed, the miniſtry were far from being popular, and ſome parts of their conduct ſeemed to border on weakneſs; ſo that it was neceſſary that ſome perſon ſhould be made choice of, who would be able, by a firmneſs of temper, to add ſome luſtre to their fading characters.

In conſequence of that reſolution, lord North was made chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townſhend paymaſter of the forces, earl Gower preſident of the council, lord Weymouth one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and Mr. Rigby was appointed one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland. Several other changes took place; but as they were all of an inferior nature, and dependent on the above, they do not deſerve a place in a work that only treats of general things, without deſcending to trifling particulars.

On the twenty-fourth of November, the parliament met, which, although their ſecond ſeſſions, was the firſt one in which they did any buſineſs of a national concern. In the ſpeech from the throne, his majeſty told the members of both houſes, that his reaſons for calling them together at ſo early a period, was to give them time for their public deliberations; and, in particular, it was recommended to them to promote our commercial intereſts in America, and other parts of the world, as the ſole baſis of all our riches. He told them, that it gave him no ſmall concern to conſider that the other powers in Europe had not attended to the articles of peace ſo ſtrictly as was conſiſtent with the faith of treaties; by which his majeſty meant the conduct of the king of Pruſſia, in meddling with the affairs of Poland. He added, that other ſovereigns might do as they pleaſed, but, for his part, he would take care that none ſhould ever accuſe him for the breach of treaties, theſe being of ſo ſacred a nature, that they ought to be religiouſly adhered to. His majeſty laid great ſtreſs on the conduct of the Americans; and it was even ſaid that Boſton was in an actual ſtate of diſobedience to all manner of government; that they had proceeded to meaſures ſubverſive of the conſtitution, and attended with circumſtances which manifeſted a diſpoſition to throw off their dependence on Great-Britain. He concluded by recommending harmony among the members, as the only ſure way of promoting the national intereſt, both at home and abroad.

When the addreſſes were moved for, great debates aroſe in both houſes, and many ſevere strictures were thrown out on the conduct of adminiſtration. The miniſtry were cenſured for ſuffering the French to take poſſeſſion of Corſica, by which the commercial intereſts of Great-Britain would be much injured in the Mediterranean. It was likewiſe inſinuated by the ſame party, that our commerce in Portugal had not been properly attended to; that our merchants had been injured in their property, and that many of our ambaſſadors at foreign courts ſpent the greateſt part of their time in England.

To this it was anſwered by the partizans for the miniſtry, that addreſſes to the throne were no more than compliments of loyalty; that the leaſt notice of ſuch a meaſure as that of refuſing to thank his majeſty, would be circulated throughout all Europe, and give foreign courts a wrong impreſſion of the Britiſh nation: that there was time enough, during the ſeſſions, to enquire into the conduct of adminiſtration, and to cenſure ſuch parts of it as ſhould appear, in the leaſt, exceptionable.

At laſt the addreſſes were preſented in the ſame form as drawn up by the miniſtry; and his majeſty was thanked, in the moſt grateful manner, for his attention to the ſtate of Europe in general, and the commerce of Britain in particular. They told his majeſty, that nothing ſhould be wanting on their parts to eſtabliſh the ſovereign power of Britain over the colonies. The firſt thing done this ſeſſion of parliament, was to bring in a bill to prevent the exportation of corn for a limited time, which, after long debates in both houſes, paſſed into an act, to the great ſatisfaction of the poor in general.

A. D. 1769. On the nineteenth of January, the parliament met, after their adjournment during the holidays; and the firſt thing taken into conſideration was the ſtate of public affairs in America. A petition was preſented, ſigned by Mr. Danforth, preſident of the council at Boſton, praying that the revenue acts might be repealed. The petition was penned in the moſt modeſt manner, with a promiſe, that if theſe acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compenſation, by taxing themſelves. Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the petition, thoſe of the antiminiſterial party making uſe of the ſame arguments which had been urged in the debate concerning the ſtamp-act.

The lords agreed to addreſs his majeſty on the American affairs; and their reſolution being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. By theſe reſolutions it was declared, that all the acts made in the different colonies, which tended towards throwing off the ſovereignty of the Britiſh parliament, were illegal, unconſtitutional, and derogatory to the crown and dignity of his majeſty. It was farther reſolved, that the town of Boſton was in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion, diſturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obſtructed in the diſcharge of their duty, and their lives endangered: that neither the council of the province, nor the ordinary magiſtrates, had exerted their authority for ſuppreſſing theſe riots and tumults; and that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the aſſiſtance of a military force to ſupport the civil power, and protect the officers of the cuſtoms: that the reſolutions of the town meetings in Boſton were unconſtitutional, and calculated to excite ſedition and inſurrection againſt the government. It was alſo agreed to by both houſes, that all thoſe who had written circular letters to the other colonies, were guilty of a high indignity to the crown, and that they had committed a daring inſult on the legiſlative power of Great-Britain. In the end, his majeſty was deſired to iſſue a ſpecial commiſſion, to enquire into the cauſes of theſe diſorders, according to the ſtatute 30th of Henry VIII. The debates on this occaſion, with reſpect to his majeſty granting writs of habeas corpus, to bring over the perſons concerned in the riots, to be tried in England by virtue of ſpecial commiſſions, was ſtrongly and learnedly oppoſed in both houſes. It was ſaid by thoſe who oppoſed the bill, that the laws already made for the preſervation of the Britiſh rights over the colonies, were ſo complete, that there was no reaſon for an amendment: that the miniſtry, having loſt all credit with the people, wanted to make the cauſe of the Americans their own, by eſtabliſhing their authority on the ruin of the colonies: that, with reſpect to bringing priſoners over from America, to be tried here for crimes ſuppoſed to have been committed there, was contrary to the ſpirit of the Engliſh conſtitution. A man charged with a crime in England, is uſually tried in the county where it is ſaid to have been committed; for this reaſon, that thoſe who carry on the proſecution may have it in their power to produce proper evidence, and that the accuſed perſon may likewiſe be able to vindicate himſelf, if innocent. But if an American was brought over here to be tried, it would be next to impoſſible for him to produce one ſingle witneſs, although he might be entirely innocent. If an American has committed any breach of the laws, let him be tried there, where juſtice can be done to both parties. It was farther urged, and repreſented as a ſtrange meaſure on this occaſion, to drag out of obſcurity an obſolete law, which was a diſhonour to the ſtatute-books: that it was made during the reign of a tyrant, to ſerve the moſt arbitrary purpoſes, becauſe our conſtitution of government had not then arrived at a ſtate of perfection: that when the above act was made, we had not one colony in America, for it had then only been recently diſcovered; and that it would be much to the honour of the legiſlative power, to expunge from the records all ſuch iniquitous ſtatutes as that already mentioned: that it was the duty of all thoſe in power to promote the intereſts of the people, both at home and abroad; but if the above meaſure was carried into execution, it would increaſe the ſeditions complained of in the colonies, and, conſequently, injure the trade of the mother-country. They concluded by calling upon the miniſtry to produce the perſon who had adviſed his majeſty to put the above act in force.

Such were the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who oppoſed adminiſtration, and certainly they were very rational, and conſiſtent with the ſpirit of our moſt excellent conſtitution. The miniſtry were ſo ſenſible of the error they had committed, that they became weak and languid in their anſwers. They referred back to the repeal of the ſtamp-act, and imputed all the troubles which had happened in America to the ill-judged lenity ſhewn on that occaſion: that nothing but the vigorous uſe of coercive authority could ever reduce them to obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity of their dependence on the mother-country: that unleſs this meaſure was adopted, the moſt flagrant acts of treaſon and rebellion, with all other public crimes, might be committed with impunity: that ſuch crimes had already been committed, and being attended with ſeveral circumſtances of an aggravating nature, the perpetrators were not objects of compaſſion: that, with reſpect to there being no colonies in America when the act of Henry VIII. was made, it did not in the leaſt apply to the argument in hand, for the act was made for the trial of all his majeſty's ſubjects who ſhould happen to commit crimes in any part of the world. For example; ſuppoſing a ſhip lying at anchor near an iſland not belonging to Britain, and two perſons go on ſhore, fight, and one of them is killed; then, by the above act, a ſpecial commiſſion is granted by the king for the trial of the offender, in whatever country he pleaſes. And, in proof of this doctrine, they mentioned an inſtance of a man of war lying at anchor in the Baltic, in 1720; and a quarrel happening between the lieutenant and the ſurgeon, they went on ſhore, fought, and the former was killed. Upon the ſhip's arrival in England, a ſpecial commiſſion was granted for the trial of the ſurgeon, who being found guilty, was executed at Tyburn. They concluded by taking notice, that the revival of the act was not to promote puniſhment, but to preſerve peace; and that the coloniſts, ſeeing the vigorous meaſures which the government intended to purſue, might be brought back to a ſenſe of their duty. Such were the hopes of adminiſtration at that time; but experience, as will appear in the ſequel, has convinced us, that they were wrong in their conjectures.

It is now neceſſary that we ſhould attend to an affair that has made a conſiderable buſtle, and, perhaps, will be looked upon by foreigners as a proof that our conſtitution is very much on the decline. We have already ſeen, that Mr. Wilkes retired to France, where he had not reſided long, when a writ of outlawry was iſſued againſt him, while the commons expelled him from their houſe. This gentleman, who had acquired a large ſhare of popularity, in conſequence of the miniſtry's having ſingled him out as an object of their vengeance, and impriſoning him illegally, was accuſed of being the author of a poem of ſo blaſphemous a nature, that no virtuous perſon would repeat a ſingle line of it; but although it had the moſt dangerous tendency towards corrupting the morals of youth, yet the means made uſe of in procuring copies of it were ſo baſe, mean, and illegal, that thoſe who hated the vices of the man abhorred the manner in which their fellow-ſubject had been treated.

Mr. Wilkes had, for ſome time, kept a printing-preſs in his own houſe; and having employed a poor, needy fellow, as a compoſitor, one of the under-ſecretaries of the treaſury prevailed on him, for a trifling conſideration, to ſteal one of the printed ſheets of the poem in queſtion. This was ſuch a flagrant act of injuſtice, that almoſt all ranks of people condemned it, except thoſe who were the perpetrators; for no man of honour or generoſity will attempt to corrupt the ſervant of another perſon, for the mean purpoſe of being revenged for a ſuppoſed affront. The miniſtry did not fail to blaſt his character as much as poſſible; and, under ſuch circumſtances, an exile from his country, diſtreſſed in his circumſtances, and, in a great meaſure, abandoned by his friends, Mr. Wilkes ſeemed not only ruined, but alſo forgotten: but when he found the parliament was diſſolved, and that there might yet be ſome hopes of his getting the outlawry reverſed, he came over to England, and offered himſelf a candidate to repreſent the city of London in parliament. There, however, he did not ſucceed; but ſeeming to riſe ſuperior to every misfortune, he addreſſed himſelf to the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, and was choſen their repreſentative by a very great majority. Having ſucceeded thus far, he ſurrendered himſelf to the court of King's-bench, where, after many learned arguments by council on both ſides, the court reverſed the writ of outlawry, but, at the ſame time, committed him to priſon for two years, as the author of a political paper called the North-Britain, and a poem intituled, An Eſſay on Woman. This ſeemed to be the laſt effort of miniſterial vengeance; and the populace, who, though irregular, on many occaſions, in their conduct, yet are generally compaſſionate, aſſembled in a body in St. George's Fields, to ſee the unfortunate priſoner. Whether they intended to reſcue Mr. Wilkes, or whether they only went there to ſignify their reſentment of the treatment he had received, certain it is, he gave them no encouragement; for he had not only voluntarily ſurrendered himſelf, but likewiſe, when he ſaw them at the gate of the priſon, he adviſed them to diſperſe in a peaceable manner. This conduct of the populace was juſt what the miniſtry wiſhed for, and therefore a detachment of the guards was ſent to diſperſe them; but, as it commonly happens in ſuch caſes, ſeveral innocent perſons loſt their lives, among whom was a young man, the ſon of an inn-keeper, who had come there only from motives of curioſity.

As the parliament was not then ſitting, Mr. Wilkes remained ſilent till the winter following, when happening to lay hold of a copy of the letter ſent by the ſecretary of ſtate to the chairman of the Surry juſtices, he cauſed it to be publiſhed, together with an introduction written by himſelf. This gave great offence to thoſe in power, and therefore Mr. Wilkes was brought to the bar of the houſe of commons, where he freely acknowledged that he had cauſed the letter to be publiſhed; upon which he was expelled the houſe, and a new writ iſſued for the election of a member to repreſent the county of Middleſex in his room.

But ſtill the majority of the freeholders adhered to this man, whoſe cauſe was conſidered as that of the public. He was re-elected a ſecond time by a majority greater than before; but that election being declared void, he was a third time elected, and again expelled. Thoſe who wiſhed well to the conſtitution, expected that this mode of election and expulſion would be continued till the end of the parliament; but a new and unheard of one was adopted.

A gentleman in the army was made choice of to offer himſelf a candidate for the county; and altho' Mr. Wilkes had a great majority, the houſe voted the military gentleman the ſitting member, which moſt people conſidered as a ſubverſion of the conſtitution. It was urged by thoſe who oppoſed the meaſure, that the right of electors to chuſe their own repreſentatives was an eſſential and an inherent part of the conſtitution; that the houſe of commons, being compoſed of perſons intruſted with delegated powers, they had no right to act in a judicative capacity; that the law of the land had regulated the qualifications of members to ſerve in parliament, and that Mr. Wilkes was not, by thoſe laws, diſqualified: that the houſe of commons has the right incidental to its judicative authority of declaring what incapacities are legal; but, at the ſame time, the houſe muſt take care in what manner it exerciſes that power, leſt it ſhould ſwell to an enormous height, and one branch of the legiſlative power aſſume to itſelf the privileges of the courts of law. It was further inſiſted on, that the power granted to the houſe in expelling members was already ſufficiently great, for none called in queſtion their privilege of expulſion; but then they had no right to hinder the electors to make choice of the expelled perſon as often as they pleaſed; nor was it conſiſtent with the firſt and fundamental principles of our conſtitution, that the houſe ſhould ſuper-add to expulſion diſqualification, becauſe that would be an encroachment on the rights of freeholders, which they had enjoyed time immemorial: that reaſon cries aloud againſt ſuch a power being lodged in any body of people whatever; and precedents were produced from the journals, to ſhew, that, till this time, the houſe had never aſſumed ſuch a prerogative, nor was it believed they would ſuffer the preſent to take place after it had been duly conſidered.

Theſe arguments were anſwered by the adherents of the miniſtry in the following manner. They ſaid, that the houſe of commons had, time immemorial, a preſcriptive right to expel their members; and that, unleſs the perſon expelled was, at the ſame time, rendered incapable of ſerving, expulſion would be no more than an open farce, by repreſenting powers to have exiſted where they never had a being: that the right claimed by the freeholders of Middleſex ſtood reprobated in the eye of common ſenſe and right reaſon, for they claimed a privilege to do wrong, by making choice of a perſon to repreſent them who had been declared incapable by the houſe, notwithſtanding his being otherwiſe in the eye of the law: that if the houſe was obliged to receive all thoſe who were returned by a majority, then the freeholders were equally obliged to return perſons properly qualified, and not throw the drudgery upon the houſe of expelling members: that the law could not foreſee every poſſible event, nor could it have been ſuppoſed that the freeholders would have acted in the manner they did, otherwiſe a law would have been provided: that our anceſtors never imagined, or never intended, that blaſphemers and infidels ſhould be the guardians of our holy religion, nor beggars the protectors of thoſe properties by which individuals ſubſiſted: that the houſe of commons was, to all intents and purpoſes, a court of judicature with reſpect to controverted elections, and that this authority was derived from the firſt principles of our conſtitution. Did any other court poſſeſs this power, members might be obtruded upon the houſe who had no right to ſit: that if the houſe did any thing which ſeemed to injure an individual, or even a collective body of people, then there could not be any other method of obtaining redreſs, than that of petitioning for a new ſtatute to regulate all future elections.

If it is aſked, Under what head of legal diſability is the preſent expulſion to be found? The anſwer is eaſy; the records of parliament will inform thoſe who have any doubts on their minds. Neither judges nor clergymen can ſit in the houſe of commons, and for this reaſon, that, by an order of the houſe, they are rendered incapable. It was ſaid, that a very extraordinary principle had been adopted in the courſe of this debate, as if the commons wanted to infringe on the liberties of the people, without recollecting that the commons and the people are virtually the ſame, and that any endeavour to make them ſeparate bodies is no leſs dangerous than it is prepoſterous. If the commons, in their repreſentative capacity, have privileges which render them important, that importance increaſes the conſequence of the people in their capacity of delegation: the people cannot be ſecure, unleſs the commons are ſecure; they are inſeparably connected, both in intereſt and freedom: and though, upon ſome occaſions, the privilege of parliament may be a ſeeming oppreſſion to individuals, the loſs of it would be attended with very fatal effects to the whole community: that if the houſe of commons had not, in their collective capacity, a title to peculiar privileges, no member of the community could claim them with any degree of propriety; and yet individuals not only claimed ſuch privileges, but were protected in the enjoyment of them by the laws of the land. That nothing could be more miſrepreſented, than by ſaying that this meaſure was an injury to the freeholders of the county of Middleſex; for, on the contrary, the injury was attempted by themſelves, who would obtrude an improper perſon on the houſe as a member, and obſtinately perſevere in the attempt, though all England was open for them to make a proper choice: that the ſuppoſed violation of right, of returning a perſon with a manifeſt inferiority of votes, will vaniſh, if the ſubject is properly conſidered, and a liberal conſtruction put upon the law: that thoſe who obſtinately perſevere in voting for an unqualified perſon, are to be conſidered as not voting at all; their right of ſuffrage is acknowledged; but if the elector obſtinately refuſes to exerciſe this right according to law, he wantonly ſuſpends his own right for the time, and his act being illegal, is, conſequently, void: he ſuffers no injury, becauſe he knows the conſequence of what he does; and if he will indulge himſelf ſo far, it can never be called a hardſhip: that an unqualified, incapacitated perſon, can be no candidate, and therefore all votes given in favour of ſuch a perſon muſt be null and void. Such were the arguments made uſe of by the miniſtry; and they, as well as the oppoſite party, ſheltered themſelves under precedents in former parliaments.

On the ninth of May, his majeſty prorogued the parliament; and, in his ſpeech, told them, that every part of their conduct gave him the greateſt ſatisfaction. He applauded them in the warmeſt manner for having attended with ſo much care to the intereſts of the people, and the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, which had been ſo frequent, not only in London, but in many parts of the country. He added, that he had done all he could to bring about a negotiation between the Turks and Ruſſians, to no purpoſe; but he hoped the calamities of war would not extend to any other parts of Europe. He thanked the commons for having ſo generouſly contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government; and promiſed, that, in the whole of his conduct, he would attend to the moſt regular œconomy. Finally, he concluded by recommending to them to promote peace among their neighbours, ſo that public juſtice might not be obſtructed, and that a proper regard ſhould be paid to the laws.

Such was the internal ſtate of Great Britain during the former part of the year, which naturally leads us to take notice of the affairs of the continent.

In Poland, the inclemency of the ſeaſon had, for ſome time, prevented the contending parties from coming to action, by which the poor diſtreſſed inhabitants, who were all divided againſt each other, had time for a ſmall reſpite.

The Turks had poſted an army of ſix thouſand men near Bender, to prevent the Ruſſians from making incurſions beyond the Ukraine, while their grand army was aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Adrianople; from whence parties were diſpatched to guard the coaſts of the Black Sea. The Turkiſh troops, many of whom had come from the warmer climates of Aſia, were extremely ſickly; and as their commanders doubted not but the Ruſſians would avail themſelves of ſuch a circumſtance, by attempting to bring on a winter campaign, they ordered all the bridges to be broken down, and the proviſions to be removed. This was a moſt fatal ſtroke for the Ruſſians; who, in conſequence thereof, were deprived of the means of ſubſiſtence, and reduced to the greateſt hardſhips. The kan of the Tartars having broken through the Ruſſian lines, entered the province of New Servia, and committed the moſt horrid depredations on the innocent inhabitants; but the fatigues he underwent put an end to his life, which was a great loſs to the Turks; for he was a man who had a perfect knowledge of military diſcipline, and was capable of conducting the greateſt army whatever.

About this time the confederates of Bar in Poland took the field, aſſiſted by ſeveral regiments of Turkiſh janizaries, and the whole began to make a very formidable appearance; but the Ruſſians, who had the advantage of diſcipline, attacked them with ſuch order and regularity, that they were defeated with great ſlaughter, and obliged to croſs the Nieſter with the loſs of their cannon, and ſuch magazines as they had formed.

In Conſtantinople, the greateſt preparations were making for opening the campaign, and as the grand viſier was to take the field, the ſtandard of Mahomet was to be diſplayed. Previous to this ceremony, a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all Chriſtians, under pain of death, not to look at this celebrated banner. But notwithſtanding this violent prohibition, yet it was impoſſible to prevent every one from ſeeing it; for it is a common obſervation, that curioſity is ſtimulated by reſtraint.

The wife and daughter of the ſieur Bronyard, ambaſſador from Vienna, diſdained the thoughts of giving up their Chriſtian freedom to Mahometan bigotry, and thereforce placed themſelves at a window oppoſite to where the proceſſion was to paſs. They were ſoon taken notice of by the Turks, who flew into the moſt violent rage, and in an inſtant the ambaſſador's houſe was ſurrounded. The ſervants, who were well provided with fire-arms, made a moſt vigorous defence; and a dreadful fray enſued, in which ſeveral perſons were killed; but the mob being numerous, they broke into the houſe, and laying hold of the ambaſſador's lady, were going to ſtrangle her, had not a party of Janizaries arrived to aſſiſt her.

The grand vizier, who was a man of knowledge and generoſity, expreſſed great ſorrow for the inſult that had been offered to the lady, and told the ambaſſador that he hoped he would impute it to the real cauſe, namely, the blind fury of an ignorant rabble, who could not be brought under proper reſtraints.

He aſſured him, at the ſame time, that he ſhould have all the reparation that was poſſible, and ſoon after the vizier ſent a preſent of jewels to his lady with a bag, containing the heads of the three principal rioters. Nor was the grand ſeignior himſelf leſs complaiſant to the ambaſſador, for he ſent his own interpreter to make an apology for the indignity offered him; and, at the ſame time, delivered him a rich preſent. This part of the conduct of the viſier and ſeignior does great honour to their good ſenſe, and may ſerve to convince us in this iſland, where we eſteem ourſelves for our politeneſs, that generoſity, benevolence, and all the other virtues are to be found among thoſe, whom we are too apt to conſider in the ſame light as barbarians.

The Turkiſh army had been long incumbered with women, a practice that has exiſted time immemorial in the eaſtern countries; but the grand-viſier, who had the moſt enlarged ſentiments concerning the duty incumbent upon him as a vice-roy, ordered them all to be ſent home, well knowing that they would, in a great meaſure retard the military operations.

In the mean time prince Gallitzin, who commanded the Ruſſian army on the banks of the Neiſter, thought this a proper time to attempt ſomething deciſive, before the Turkiſh army ſhould arrive. Accordingly having croſſed that river, he marched to Choczim, where he encamped in ſight of a body of thirty thouſand Turks, under the command of Caraman Pacha, who were ſtrongly entrenched under the cannon of that town. In the beginning of April the prince made the neceſſary diſpoſition for attacking the Turks in their entrenchments; and notwithſtanding a moſt vigorous defence, he drove them from all their advanced poſts, and obliged them to take ſhelter within the palliſadoes of the fortreſs. The fire was ſo violent from the Ruſſian artillery, that the greateſt part of the town was reduced to aſhes; while the Jews and Chriſtians, who lived in it, having abandoned their moſt valuable effects, made their eſcape out of one of the poſterns, and took refuge among the Ruſſians, rather than give themſelves up to the inhuman barbarity of the Turks.

The Ruſſians began to form great hopes from this ſucceſsful event; but in the midſt of their rapid progreſs, they were obliged to retreat and croſs the Neiſter, while the Turks harraſſed them in the rear with unremitting fury. The circumſtances of this retreat were ſo extraordinary, that the Ruſſians did not ſo much as attempt to guard the paſſages of the river, and the Turkiſh cavalry over-run the neighbouring provinces, burning and deſtroying all the houſes where the Ruſſians had depoſited their ſtores and proviſions. A moſt pompous account of this affair was publiſhed at Conſtantinople, and the grand ſeignior went in public proceſſion to the moſque to return thanks to heaven, where the mufti or chief prieſt beſtowed upon him his ſolemn benediction, and inveſted him with the title of conqueror. It is true, hyperbole, or an extravagant uſe of words, has long been the cuſtom of the eaſtern nations, and conſiſtent with ſound policy it may, in ſome meaſure, be juſtified; for ſuch exaggerated accounts fill the minds of the vulgar with ſurprize, and keep them in proper ſubjection to government.

In the mean time, general Romanzow, who commanded a part of the Ruſſian army, made an attempt on the important fortreſs of Oczakow, the capital of the Budziac Tartary, where the great river Boriſthenes falls into the Black Sea; a place of great importance, becauſe it opens a communication with the mouth of the Danube, and with ſeveral Turkiſh European provinces. The place was ſtrong both by nature and art, and in it was a garriſon of about twenty thouſand Turks, ſo that notwithſtanding the Ruſſian general attacked it with great fury, yet he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and in his retreat was ſo much harraſſed by the Turks, that he loſt a great number of men. This action, though no way very conſiderable, was repreſented at Conſtantinople as a moſt ſignal victory, and great rejoicings were made upon it. The common people were told that the Ruſſians were almoſt totally defeated; which had ſuch an-an effect upon their minds, that had they not been reſtrained by the civil power, they would have put to death all the Chriſtians in that city.

In the mean time, the grand Turkiſh army moved ſlowly, and the grand vizier had many difficulties to encounter, for it was no eaſy matter to bring an army under proper rules of diſcipline, that had been collected from above fifty different nations. In general they either hated or deſpiſed each other, ſome valuing themſelves on the courage that their anceſtors had diſplayed in the field of battle, while others had nothing to boaſt beſides that of their being born in the fertile plains of Syria, or the romantic mountains near the Caſpian ſea. Nor was it much better with the officers, for they were continually quarrelling among themſelves, and on many occaſions refuſed to obey their orders. The Janizaries, a ſort of militia, though the ſtanding army of the Turkiſh empire, had been always accuſtomed to ſet the example to the other troops of obeying their officers and fighting in defence of their court; but now they became ſo licentious, that diſcipline was trampled under foot, and the whole army exhibited one ſcene of riot and diſorder.

During the continuance of theſe diſorders, the grand vizier acted like a man of wiſdom and prudence; for confiding in the power that was repoſed in him, he inſiſted that every ſoldier in the army ſhould attend to his duty, or be puniſhed in the moſt exemplary manner. In the mean time, he knew that nothing would be more dangerous than to ſuffer an irregular undiſciplined army to engage with the veteran forces of Ruſſia; and therefore he ordered ſeveral detachments to advance in the front, that they might learn the art of war by ſkirmiſhing with the enemy. Such was the conduct of the grand vizer, and thoſe who have read the Roman hiſtory muſt acknowledge, that it was not inferior to any thing performed by the great Fabius, when he was ſent to oppoſe Hannibal. Great abilities are often concealed under the covert of ſuppoſed ignorance; but all mankind being by nature the ſame, the latent ſeeds of knowledge will break forth nothwithſtanding every oppoſition.

While the Turkiſh vizier was going on in this prudent manner, prince Gallitzen was making preparations for croſſing the Neiſter; and for that purpoſe he detached general Rennecamp with a conſiderable body of forces to divert the attention of the enemy on the other ſide of the river. This meaſure had the deſired effect; for the Ruſſian army having marched a few miles to the ſouth, croſſed the river without the leaſt moleſtation.

Before the Turks were aware, the Ruſſians attacked them with great fury, while the Turkiſh army did all they could to defend themſelves; but diſcipline overcame numbers, and the Ruſſians drove them once more to their entrenchments under the walls of Choczim. This victory was owing to the bravery of the Ruſſian infantry, who ſtood immoveable, and proceeded gradually as the Turks retreated, killing them in great numbers. During all theſe misfortunes the grand vizier did not deſpair; he knew that his army was, for the moſt part, an undiſciplined rabble; but he knew that action would bring them into exerciſe, and therefore he reſolved to perſevere in his duty.

Whenever the Turkiſh arms are not ſucceſsful, thoſe who command them are ſure to be diſgraced, if not executed, and the more elevated their rank, the greater their danger. Thus the grand vizier, who had hitherto acted with great prudence, and gone great lengths in eſtabliſhing military diſcipline, fell a ſacrifice to miſguided fury, and Ali Pacha Moldavini, a man of a moſt violent temper, was appointed his ſucceſſor. Many other changes took place both at court and in the army; and while the vizier Carman Pacha went to meet him in the moſt humble and reſpectful manner, but for ſome ſecret grudge that the vizier had againſt him, his head was ordered to be cut off. The unfortunate baſſaw endeavoured to retire, and for his own ſafety drew his ſword, but he was ſoon ſurrounded by numbers and cut in pieces.

In the mean time his ſelictar or ſword-bearer, fired with indignation at the fate of his maſter, drew out a piſtol and aimed the ſhot at the head of the vizier, who would have been ſhot, had not one of his faithful domeſtics ſaved his life at the expence of his own. The ſelictar was ſoon overpowered and cut in pieces, and both their heads cut off and expoſed, according to the Turkiſh cuſtom, on the front of the grand vizier's tent. From the fate of theſe two brave men, we may learn that the Turks, although not ſuch barbarians as they were when they conquered that extenſive empire, yet they are ſtill far from being a poliſhed people.

General Romanzow committed great ravages in the neighbourhood of Bender, where he burnt and plundered ſeveral towns and villages, defeated a detachment of Turks, and drove off a great booty of cattle. The Tartars alſo committed great ravages in Poland, where they almoſt totally deſtroyed the palatinate of Bricklaw, beſides doing much miſchief in other places. In the beginning of September the Ruſſians lay encamped on the banks of the Nieſter, and defended the paſſage of that river againſt the Turks, whoſe whole army, under the new vizier, arrived on the oppoſite banks.

The vizier next night ordered a detachment of his beſt troops, conſiſting of eight thouſand, to croſs the river, a few miles below, and attack the Ruſſians in flank. This they did, and for ſome time the battle was extremely furious; but at laſt the Turks were obliged to retreat acroſs the river, after loſing four thouſand of their beſt troops.

The ſending detachments acroſs rivers where a great army is encamped, is a ſtrong proof that the vizier was utterly deſtitute of ſkill in military affairs; for how could he expect that they would be able either to oppoſe the Ruſſians, or to retreat, ſeeing there was no communication between them and the main army but by croſſing the river. Indeed the vizier was too raſh and obſtinate to hearken to the advice of his officers; for as his predeceſſor had been diſplaced for being too cautious, he reſolved to ſucceed by an oppoſite extreme.

In conſequence of a reſolution bordering on madneſs, the vizier ordered three bridges to be laid acroſs the Neiſter, and began to croſs that river in ſight of the whole Ruſſian army. Prince Gallitzin ſuffered a conſiderable number of them to croſs, and then about ſeven o'clock on the morning of the ninth of September, he attacked them with his infantry in three ſquare columns, and the battle was obſtinately diſputed till noon, when the Ruſſians puſhed on ſo furiouſly, with their bayonets fixed, that the Turks were obliged to give way.

It muſt be acknowledged that the Turks behaved with great bravery, but ſuch was the ignorance and obſtinacy of the vizier, that he never conſidered the nature of the ground, ſo that his men were taken in both flanks before they could poſſibly form, and in the battle and retreating acroſs the bridges, the flower of their beſt troops were deſtroyed. Seven thouſand Turks were left dead on the field, beſides thoſe that were wounded and taken priſoners, and a great number were drowned in croſſing the river.

This dreadful carnage, the ſignal and immediate puniſhment of folly and raſhneſs, would have ſtruck any mind, except that of the vizier's. It ſeems unaccountable that the ſoldiers, who were ſo turbulent and ungovernable under the late vizier, ſhould now bear the continual deſtruction that attended this extravagant conduct, without flying into any act of extremity. It may, however, ſerve to ſhew that there is nothing an army will not attempt or endure for a general who keeps the ſoldiers warm in continual action; if, at the ſame, he directs his conduct in ſuch a manner as ſeems conſiſtent with real courage, though ſome degree of prudence may be wanting.

The vizier, not in the leaſt diſpirited by his loſs, laid one bridge only acroſs the river, and had the precaution to cover it with ſeveral batteries of cannon, his reſolution being to croſs the river with the whole army, let the conſequences be what they would. This was ſuch a bold attempt, that we ſcarce find an inſtance in hiſtory parallel to it; and had it been mixed with prudence, the name of this vizier would have been much more reſpectable than it is.

Four thouſand cavalry, with eight thouſand janizaries, had already croſſed the river, and with them was a large train of artillery; and the reſt of the army was in motion to follow them, when a ſudden ſwell of the river carried away the bridge. Thus were twelve thouſand brave men incloſed by the Ruſſian army in the front, and the river now rendered impaſſable in the rear, without time or an opportunity of entrenching themſelves.

The Ruſſians ſeeing them in ſuch a deplorable ſituation, reſolved to avail themſelves of ſo favourable an opportunity. An engagement, truly deſperate, enſued, in which the Ruſſians fought like men who were aſſured of ſucceſs, while the Turks reſolved to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. The ſeverity of the Turkiſh manners, which has not admitted of the civilized and humane cuſtom of exchanging priſoners, prevented a capitulation from being deſired, or any propoſals for laying down their arms. The battle was ſevere, and the ſlaughter prodigious. About three hundred, out of twelve thouſand, eſcaped by ſwimming, the reſt being either killed in the field, drowned in the river, or taken priſoners. Sixty-four pieces of cannon were taken, with one hundred and fifty ſtandards; and, for ſeveral miles, nothing was to be ſeen but dead bodies.

The agitation of mind which the Turkiſh forces muſt ſuffer, who were the unhappy ſpectators, on the oppoſite ſhore of the river, of the cruel ſlaughter of their friends, may poſſibly be conceived, but cannot be deſcribed. Perhaps, to a feeling, tender mind, the momentary agony was more ſevere to him who was the looker on, than to the immediate ſufferer. While the bloody conteſt continued, the whole army was buried in ſilence; but when the ſlaughter was finiſhed, and all hopes loſt, they expreſſed their rage and grief in the bittereſt cries and lamentations; at the ſame time, imprecating the moſt bitter curſes on the vizier.

In the midſt of their rage and deſpair, they broke up the camp; and throwing off all obedience to their leaders, abandoned the ſtrong fort of Choczim, and retired, in a tumultuous manner, towards the Danube. Immediately prince Gallitzin ſent a detachment to take poſſeſſion of the place, and there they found the whole of the ſtores and ammunition belonging to the Turks; for ſuch was the terror they were thrown into, that they never once thought of ſecuring or deſtroying them.

Prince Gallitzin having placed a garriſon of four regiments in the fort, under the command of count Romanzow, who, at the ſame time, was to remain commander in chief of the army till his return, ſet out for the court of Peterſburgh, to receive the thanks of his royal miſtreſs. Another army of Ruſſians over-ran the province of Moldavia, and took poſſeſſion of the capital of Jaſſy, ſituated on the river Pruth, about one hundred miles eaſtward of Choczim.

While the war was carried on in this manner between the Turks and Ruſſians, the pope died at Rome in a very advanced age, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Ganganelli, who aſſumed the name of Clement XIV. He had been brought up, from his moſt early youth, for the church; and, to an univerſal acquaintance with learning in general, he had added moderation in his conduct; and was an enemy to all combinations among princes, which tend to prolong civil diſturbances. He endeared himſelf to the people of Rome, by iſſuing orders for lowering the prices of proviſions; and he ſuppreſſed the cuſtom, ſo long in uſe with his predeceſſors, to oblige all foreign ambaſſadors to kiſs their toe.

A. D. 1770. In England, during the preceding ſummer, ſeveral remonſtrances had been preſented to the throne, complaining of an undue election of a member for the county of Middleſex; but all the anſwer the remonſtrance received was, that his majeſty would do nothing without the conſent of his parliament. That the miniſtry might be ſupported effectually, it was reſolved on in council to adhere to their grand ſcheme, the Middleſex election, as a perpetual rule of policy. "Beſides, (ſaid they) if the ſubjects are permitted to go on in this manner, remonſtrating againſt the conduct of their own repreſentatives, we ſhall be ſure of a majority in parliament."

While the minds of the people in general were agitated in conſidering what would be the event of theſe things, both houſes of parliament met; but not the leaſt notice was taken of the remonſtrances in the ſpeech from the throne, which ſurpriſed people ſtill more; but then it was conſidered, that the miniſtry had determined to add fortitude to their conduct, whether it were right or wrong.

Some notice was taken of foreign affairs, particularly the ſtate of the war between the Turks and the Ruſſians: but the principal things inſiſted on by his majeſty, were the following, namely, the diſtracted ſtate of America, and the diſtemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the ſtrongeſt terms, recommended to their ſerious attention, as a thing of the utmoſt importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a moſt dreadful calamity to the nation in general; and it was recommended to every one to exert themſelves in endeavouring to put a ſtop to the infection, before it ſhould ſpread any farther.

This ſpeech was ſeverely handled by the public in general, who thought that nothing ſhould have been ſo much touched on as the petitions and remonſtrances. Ridicule was circulated with great freedom, eſpecially as the exiſtence of the diſtemper among the horned cattle was not believed to be of ſo univerſal a nature as had been inſinuated and repreſented.

It was immediately moved by the miniſtry, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to the throne; upon which a moſt violent debate aroſe, and it was carried on with a heat of temper and ſeverity of expreſſion ſcarce ever known in the houſe before.

It was inſiſted by thoſe who oppoſed the miniſtry, that, in the addreſs, it ſhould be recommended to his majeſty to take into conſideration the grievances of the people. On the other hand, the exiſtence of thoſe pretended was denied, and all the diſcontents among the people were aſcribed to the conduct of thoſe gentlemen who had been diſappointed in their ambitious views. It was farther urged, that even allowing grievances to exiſt, as ſtated in the remonſtrances, yet the methods uſed in ſeeking redreſs had been very indecent and unbecoming: that not one tenth of the freeholders, and but very few of the clergy or juſtices of the peace, had ſigned theſe petitions; and although there might be ſome reſpectable names found to them, yet the whole could be conſidered in no other light than as the act of a rabble.

Such were the outlines of the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who ſtood up in defence of adminiſtration; and many virulent epithets were thrown out on the other party, whom, in deriſion, they called Petition-hunters. Theſe charges drew from the gentlemen in the oppoſition a ſpirited avowal of the part they had taken in reſpect to the petitions, and of the ſentiments they delivered to their conſtituents. They inſiſted, that they were under obligations to give an account of their conduct in parliament to their conſtituents, and to give them the moſt early notice of every meaſure adopted by the court, that might, in the leaſt, threaten the ſubverſion of their rights and privileges; privileges. That in the preſent inſtance, they had not hunted after petitions, for the petitioners had ſought them, and had charged them with their commands, which they were bound to deliver. It had been inſinuated by ſome of the miniſtry, that theſe meetings were ſeditious; but thoſe in the oppoſition treated the expreſſion with every term of ridicule, and threw back the charge, by calling every meeting of the miniſtry theſe two years, no better than a ſeditious one; becauſe in them were laid ſchemes for trampling on the rights of the ſubjects. Theſe debates, which were carried on with too much heat by both parties to bring any honour to the ſpeakers, being ended, the addreſs was voted for and carried by a great majority.

Before any buſineſs of importance was undertaken, ſome very remarkable changes took place in the miniſtry. The ſeals were taken from lord Camden, and the honourable Charles York was created chancellor in his room, but he died within three days afterwards; and then the chancery was put into commiſſion, the ſeals being delivered to baron Smythe, and the juſtices Bathurſt and Aſton. The marquis of Granby reſigned all his places, except the royal regiment of blues, and was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance by general Conway. The duke of Beaufort reſigned the place of maſter of the horſe to the queen; the earl of Huntingdon his place of groom of the ſtole; and the duke of Mancheſter, with the earl of Coventry, their places of lords of the bedchamber. Mr. Dunning, the ſollicitor-general, and Mr. Grenville, one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland, reſigned at the ſame time. The whole of the adminiſtration ſeemed to be falling in pieces, a general panic prevailed; but the court, reſolute to its purpoſe, was determined to fight the battle notwithſtanding the deſertion of ſo many of its principal commanders. Sir John Cuſt, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, reſigned at the ſame time; but that was owing to his age and infirm ſtate of health. In his room was elected Sir Fletcher Norton, a gentleman who had made a very diſtinguiſhing figure at the bar, and who had lately been advanced to a moſt valuable ſinecure.

Within a week after theſe changes had taken place, the duke of Grafton, to the aſtoniſhment of the whole nation, reſigned the place of firſt lord of the treaſury, and was ſucceeded by lord North, who had been ſome time chancellor of the exchequer. Various were the cauſes aſſigned by the public for this act of the duke's, ſome attributing it to fear, and others to treachery; but as he ſtill continued to ſupport all the meaſures of government, it appeared evident that the ſole reaſon was, the neceſſity of having one of the members of the houſe of commons to be at the head of public affairs.

The firſt thing that came before the commons was an enquiry into the validity of the Middleſex election; but after warm debates it was held, by a conſiderable majority, that no court of law was to meddle with any of their rules and orders. This meaſure aſtoniſhed the whole nation, and many perſons began to look upon the houſe of commons as a ſtanding council for the crown. Nor was this important ſubject agitated with leſs heat in the houſe of lords. The earl of Chatham with lord Camden, and many other peers, oppoſed it with great ſtrength of argument, and produced proofs from many of our law books and parliamentary journals, that no ſuch ſtep had ever been taken, not even in the moſt deſpotic reigns. But notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, miniſterial intereſt prevailed, and the proceeding of the houſe of commons, in the affair of the Middleſex election, were all juſt and equitable.

A motion was made to bring in a bill to diſqualify certain officers of the revenues from voting for members of parliament. It was ſaid by thoſe who ſupported the motion, that at the revolution the produce of the cuſtoms and exciſe were both extremely ſmall, nor was there at that time any probability that they would ever amount to the enormous ſum of ſix millions ſterling, as they then actually did. To this they attributed the inattention of the patriots of that age, who, if they had foreſeen the unconſtitutional weight that muſt have been thrown into the ſcale on the ſide of the crown, by the appointment of officers to collect ſo vaſt a revenue, they would undoubtedly have taken proper and effectual meaſures to prevent the dangerous influence which it muſt afford, in the election of repreſentatives for the people.

On the other ſide it was urged, that the bill was altogether unneceſſary, and in its own nature extremely cruel. That it was no leſs than the diſfranchiſing a great number of men who had long enjoyed that privilege; and as the motion then ſtood, it might extend to all the officers under the crown. It was added, that no evidence had been ſo much as ſuggeſted of any undue influence uſed by the crown, and therefore the motion was rejected by a very great majority.

The popular party, having loſt this motion, deſired that all the papers, containing a liſt of the expences of government, ſhould be laid before them. It was ſaid in ſupport of the motion, that the civil-liſt revenue if miſapplied, inſtead of maintaining the dignity of the crown, ſerved only to beſiege it with paraſites; and in the place of promoting arts and induſtry, to ſubvert the liberties of the people. That though the funds allotted for this purpoſe were fully adequate, not only to every neceſſary, but to every liberal expence, that was neceſſary to ſupport the dignity of the regal character; yet neither the greatneſs of the fund, nor the confeſſed œconomy of the times, were ſufficient to prevent an enormous debt from being contracted, and the people from being applied to for more money, at a time when men in the kingdom were of opinion that too much had been granted already.

That neceſſary expences had been much more conſiderable in the latter reign than the preſent, becauſe the branches of the royal family were then grown up, and conſequently demanded larger allowances. The journies to the continent, however expedient, were frequent, and at all times expenſive; and none would pretend to ſay, that magnificence was not as well underſtood, and perhaps better ſupported, than at preſent; yet his late majeſty not only lived within the bounds of the civil-liſt, but a ſum of one hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds wholly ſaved from that revenue.

That it was neither intended nor wiſhed, to limit the crown to a ſalary inadequate to its real dignity and greatneſs; for if it ſhould appear that the money had been ſpent in promoting uſeful purpoſes, thoſe who made the motion will be the firſt to give their approbation. But if on the contrary, it ſhould appear that the money had been ſquandered away among time-ſerving wretches, who ſought to ruin their country, then thoſe who adviſed ſuch meaſures ſhould be called to a ſevere account.

To this it was anſwered by thoſe who ſtood up for the miniſtry, that if an application had been now made for an additional ſum to make good any deficiency in the civil-liſt eſtabliſhment, an enquiry into the cauſes of it would be natural and juſtifiable; and it would be but reaſonable, that the miniſtry, in ſuch a circumſtance, ſhould give the utmoſt ſatisfaction to the people; nay, that it was even their duty to do ſo, and ſhew the reaſons why the proviſion already made was not ſufficient; but till ſuch a requiſition was made, it would be improper and very diſreſpectful to the crown, to ſcrutinize into the manner in which the money for the ſupport of the royal family had been expended. It was urged farther, that a certain ſum of money was allowed annually for the ſupport of the civil-liſt, and while the expences do not exceed that ſum, there can be no reaſon for making any enquiry. They concluded by taking notice, that as the civil-liſt was the property of the crown, his majeſty had a right to diſpoſe of it in whatever manner he pleaſed. At laſt, the vote being put, the motion, like all others oppoſed by the miniſtry, was rejected by a great majority.

This affair, which had made no ſmall noiſe out of doors, being over, the next thing was to take into conſideration the ſtate of the colonies in America. A petition had been preſented by the merchants trading to North-America, ſetting forth the great hardſhips they laboured under in conſequence of an act, by which a duty had been laid on ſome trifling articles exported from Great-Britain; and this had ſo much enraged the people, that they refuſed to purchaſe the goods, after they had been ſent there at a conſiderable expence. This affair being of a very ſerious nature, the houſe took it into conſideration, and repealed every part of it, except what related to tea, which was ſtill continued. The debates concerning this bill were managed by great force of argument on both ſides, for the popular party ſought a repeal of the whole, while the miniſtry inſiſted, that the Americans, inſtead of deſerving any ſuch indulgence, ought to have had more ſevere laws binding upon them.

While the greateſt part of the nation was agitated by reflecting on the conſequences that would reſult from theſe meaſures; while individuals were ſeeking to promote their private intereſts, and the government to eſtabliſh its authority, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by one of the leading men in the oppoſition, for regulating the proceedings on controverted elections; a bill equally juſt and popular, and which all the ſubjects of Great-Britain were more or leſs concerned. It will be proper to make the reader acquainted with the nature of this bill, that he may be the better able to judge of its utility, and how far ſuch a law was, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary.

It had been the cuſtom formerly in all conteſted elections, to refer the matter to a ſelect committee of the moſt learned and upright members in the houſe; and, in general, their opinion was ſeldom called in queſtion; but in time the committees had been enlarged, and all who came in having votes, a ſhameful partiality prevailed, which in the end induced thoſe, who thought themſelves injured, to apply for remedy at the bar of the houſe.

This method, however, was found to be very defective, and attended with many inconveniences, owing principally to the vaſt number of thoſe who were to try the cauſe in diſpute; and who, beſides being biaſſed by the ties of private friendſhip, were not bound by any oath to prevent ſuch influence from operating on their minds.

At the ſame time, the method of trying theſe cauſes at the bar became an obſtacle to many branches of public buſineſs, eſpecially in the laſt ſeſſions of a new parliament, when there was ſcarce time to attend to any thing elſe. It was at the ſame time very diſagreeable to the members themſelves, who were continually teazed with applications in favour of both candidates, that they would give their attendance, and although it was not ſaid that they were to vote contrary to truth and equity, yet their attendance was conſidered as equivalent to their approbation. To all this it may be added, that as the miniſtry have always a majority on their ſide to ſupport them in all their meaſures, ſo if they chuſe to ſtand up in defence of any one of the candidates, they can, by promiſes and threatenings, get a ſufficient number to vote him the ſitting member.

To remedy theſe defects this bill was brought in, and the plan of it was conſiſtent with the firſt principles of the conſtitution. When a petition was to be preſented, a day was to be fixed for hearing both parties, who were to attend with their witneſſes and council; and if one hundred members were not preſent, then they were to wait till ſuch time as ſo many were preſent; when the names of the whole, altho' they ſhould exceed that number, were to be put into ſix boxes or glaſſes, to be drawn alternately and read by the ſpeaker, till forty-nine are choſen; the ſitting member and the petitioner being allowed to chuſe one each. Liſts were then to be given to the ſitting member, the petitioner, councils, witneſſes, &c. who, with the clerk, were to withdraw, and ſtrike off one alternately till the number ſhould be reduced to thirteen; who, with the two named by the parties, were to make a committee to determine the affair in diſpute, Such was the nature of this new bill, and it muſt be acknowledged that nothing could be more juſt or equitable for the freedom of elections, and every meaſure uſed to prevent corruption and bribery muſt at all times be the life of the Britiſh conſtitution.

While the houſe of commons were engaged on this grand ſubject, the city of London met in their common-hall, and agreed upon another petition, addreſs and remonſtrance, for redreſs of their pretended grievances in the affair of the Middleſex election. In this addreſs it was expreſsly declared, that the houſe of commons had acted in the moſt unconſtitutional manner, and therefore they prayed that they might be diſſolved; that the people might be left at liberty to make a free choice. In anſwer to this, his majeſty told them, that he had never done any thing but by the advice and conſent of his parliament, and therefore he could not comply with their requeſt.

Violent diſputes aroſe in parliament on this affair, and many opprobrious expreſſions were made uſe of on both ſides. It was ſaid that the citizens of London were the ſupport of the government on every occaſion; that it had been the cuſtom, time immemorial, to conſult them on the moſt important matters; to which the miniſtry anſwered, that no affront had been offered to the citizens of London, nor any thing denied them, except ſuch as was in its own nature improper to be granted.

It is now neceſſary that we ſhould take ſome view of the affairs of Ireland, which for ſome time had been thrown into great confuſion, in conſequence of a bill being brought in and paſſed, by which a new parliament is to be elected every eight years. From the Revolution down to the year 1769, the parliaments of Ireland continued till the death of the king; ſo that the members became a ſtanding council to adminiſtration. while the people were deprived of their privileges. One would have thought that an act of ſo popular a nature as that of having frequent parliaments, would have met with the approbation of all ranks of people; but in many inſtances the reverſe took place.

Many of thoſe who had been long in parliament conſidered themſelves as injured, becauſe they had been made to believe, that they ſhould not vacate their ſeats till the death of the king. Theſe brought over all their dependents to ſecond them, but their reſentment was concealed for ſome time. When the new parliament met nothing but harmony was to be ſeen among the members, and the lord-lieutenant was treated with every mark of reſpect: but this good humour was of ſhort continuance.

The lord-lieutenant, according to orders received from the miniſtry, thought this a fair opportunity for bringing in a bill for the augmentation of the forces, which had failed of ſucceſs at the breaking up of the laſt parliament. Accordingly a meſſage was ſent, recommending this meaſure in the ſtrongeſt terms from the throne, as a matter his majeſty had much at heart, for the honour of the crown and the ſafety of the kingdom.

This augmentation was to conſiſt of private men only, without any additional officers; and it was propoſed further, that as ſoon as the old ſtaff officers died, no more new ones ſhould be appointed, except one commander in chief, and five generals. Great oppoſition was made to this bill, for it was alledged that ſuch a requiſition was unneceſſary in time of profound peace; that the military eſtabliſhment in that kingdom was already too expenſive, while the nation was loaded with taxes to ſupport them; that although the nation paid for twelve thouſand effective men for the ſecurity of the ſtate, yet above four thouſand of theſe were abroad in different garriſons. It is impoſſible to expreſs the warmth of contention that aroſe between the court and the popular party.

It was conſidered as a moſt odious meaſure, that a bill brought into the houſe of commons in Ireland ſhould have been framed by the privy-council in England. It is true, there is a law for that purpoſe, commonly called Poyning's act; but as it was made in the arbitrary and tyrannical reign of Henry VII. ſo all ſober men thought that in this enlightened age, it ought to have been ſet aſide.

It was urged further, that this was a money bill, with which the privy-council of England had nothing to do. Nay, they could not meddle with ſuch things, even in their own country. That money could only be raiſed by the repreſentatives of the people, and it was known to every one that no body of men were repreſented by the privy-council, they themſelves being taxed in parliament by every new bill, which becomes binding on them as well as on the reſt of the ſubjects.

Thoſe who ſtood up for the miniſtry in ſupport of the bill had very little to ſay, for they ſaw that they had begun the bill in a very improper manner. Had it originated in the Iriſh houſe of commons, there is reaſon to imagine that the bill would have paſſed; but the clamour was ſo great that it was rejected by a very great majority.

But notwithſtanding the bill was rejected, yet the commons voted the moſt liberal ſupply for the ſupport of the civil-liſt, and all other expences attending the government. The lord-lieutenant was ſo much diſappointed at the loſs of his favourite bill, that he went to the houſe of peers and entered a formal proteſt againſt it, as an act of diſobedience to the privy-council. He then made a long ſpeech from the throne, after which he prorogued the parliament. Some ſuſpicions that the lord-lieutenant was going to prorogue the parliament had taken place a week before, and thoſe lords who had oppoſed his meaſures, made a motion, that no proteſt ſhould be entered in the journals, unleſs ſigned by a lord of parliament. This occaſioned a moſt violent debate; but the motion being rejected by a ſmall majority, the minority entered a proteſt againſt it. The houſe of commons, previous to their breaking up, forbid the lord-lieutenant's ſpeech from being entered in the journals.

Such were the proceedings in this firſt ſeſſions of the firſt limited parliament. No buſineſs had paſſed, except that of granting the common ſupplies. All the national buſineſs was left undone; the temporary acts, which are either altered or reverſed every year, whether relative to agriculture, trade, the preſervation of the public ſafety, the ſupplying the capital with proviſions, and the ſupport of public charities, were now at an end. The whole kingdom was filled with the utmoſt conſternation, diſcontents took place every where, and nothing but confuſion was to be ſeen.

This affair being of the utmoſt importance, a motion was made in the Engliſh houſe of commons, that all the inſtructions ſent to the lord-lieutenant ſhould be laid before the houſe. In the debates on this ſubject, the conduct of the lord-lieutenant was treated with particular marks of ſeverity; for it was ſaid, that he had cajoled the parliament of Ireland out of a conſiderable ſum, and then prorogued them before they had time to enter on the national buſineſs. It was added further, that the Engliſh parliament was called upon by every motive of juſtice and humanity, to enquire into the ſtate of our ſiſter kingdom, and to grant them that redreſs which their own parliament could not.

On the other hand it was urged, that a controuling power muſt be lodged ſomewhere. That Poyning's law had lodged that controuling power in the king and council, and as the Iriſh houſe of commons had refuſed to obey that law, the lord-lieutenant was under the neceſſity of proroguing them. That they had, by their conduct, ſtruck at the root of the conſtitution; and that if the lord-lieutenant had not prorogued them, he would have been liable to an impeachment. However, this motion, like others brought in by the miniſtry, was over-ruled, and Ireland was left, for ſome time, in a ſtate of confuſion and diſtreſs.

Near the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament, ſeveral propoſals were made in the houſe of lords relating to the ſtate affairs in America; and theſe were chiefly ſupported by the duke of Richmond. Theſe were introduced by ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of adminiſtration. He ſaid, that the ſtate of America had been recommended from the throne in a ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, and yet the ſeſſion was near ſpent without any thing being done, though the buſineſs was of the utmoſt importance. The miniſtry were now ſenſible that they had been too raſh in recommending the care of America before any ſettled plan had been laid down; and therefore, perplexed to the utmoſt, they ſaw no other method left, but that of adjourning the debate till a future day, well knowing that the parliament would be prorogued.

On the nineteenth of May his majeſty went to the houſe, and, in a ſpeech from the throne, applauded them for the zeal they had ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation. He aſſured them, that he ſhould, on all occaſions, ſeek the happineſs of his people; and that it ſhould be the ſole object of his care, to watch over their intereſts. He concluded, by recommending to them the preſervation of public peace, and the diſcountenancing of tumultuous meetings of the people, which, if encouraged, muſt end in general confuſion.

Before we return to take notice of the ſtate of affairs on the continent, we ſhall here obſerve, that on the twenty-ſeventh of July, about four o'clock in the morning, a moſt dreadful fire broke out, or was diſcovered in the great dock-yard at Portſmouth. It burnt with the moſt rapid fury, and communicating itſelf with the hemp-houſe, and other offices, conſumed every thing before it. Whether this was an accident, or the work of ſome vile wretch and incendiary, has not yet been diſcovered, and perhaps never will. Some impoſtors, indeed, pretended to have been concerned in it, particularly one Dudley, who has ſince that time been tranſported for perjury; and the other, whoſe name was Britain, has been ſince executed for forgery. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this fatal affair was, the fire was diſcovered in five different places at once, which gave ſtrong ſuſpicions that more than one perſon muſt have been concerned; for accidental fires generally break out in one place only. Had this accident, or whatever it was, happened during the heat of the war, it might have proved fatal to the nation in general; for the whole loſs, amounting to one hundred and forty-nine thouſand, eight hundred and eighty-eight pounds, could not have been made good without great difficulty, till ſuch time as the parliament met. But even ſuppoſing one individual could have advanced it, yet the time neceſſary for replacing the ſtores, might have given the enemy an opportunity of doing great injury to the place.

While the Ruſſians ſeemed to triumph on the Danube and Neiſter, a large fleet of men of war was fitted out, by order of the empreſs, to paſs the Sound, and from thence proceed up the ſtreights to attack the Turks by ſea as well as land. It will appear evident to thoſe perſons converſant with hiſtory, that extraordinary events are ſeldom brought about but by a concurrence of circumſtances to facilitate their execution; and it may perhaps be aſſerted, that all the great revolutions of which we read in hiſtory, would have failed had they not been attempted at one particular period; namely, that in which they took place.

The efforts of Peter the Great to create a navy, and bring up ſailors, had been looked upon as the extraordinary attempt of a great man, and it was imagined the project would die with him, but the reverſe took place; for although Ruſſia has been, almoſt ſince his death, governed by women, yet their empire has been advancing gradually to a ſtate of perfection. Her navy is now as reſpectable as can be imagined; and her ſailors, naturally robuſt and hardy, think no dangers too great.

The laſt vizier, who had acted in ſo raſh and unguarded a manner, was depoſed, and baniſhed to one of the Greek iſlands; and that honour was conferred on Hiliel Bey, a man of great abilities and unſhaken integrity. He knew that the provinces of Moldavia and Walachia were the grand objects the Ruſſians had in view; and therefore, contrary to the cuſtom of the Turks, he reſolved to venture on a winter campaign. This was a deſign worthy of a great commander; for he imagined that the Ruſſians would be too much fluſhed with their late ſucceſſes, to think of any attack being made upon them. In that, however, the vizier was miſtaken; for the Ruſſians were too vigilant to be ſurpriſed, and both armies continued ſkirmiſhing, in ſmall parties, during the winter and ſpring. In general, the Ruſſians were ſucceſsful in theſe engagements, ſo that the grand vizier's plan did not ſucceed in its full extent; but ſtill, by keeping his men in continual action, they became more and more acquainted with the art of war.

In the mean time, the country where the ſeat of war lay preſented a ſcene of the moſt dreadful deſolation; almoſt every thing had been deſtroyed; and ſuch of the miſerable inhabitants as had not time to eſcape to the neighbouring countries, were either made ſlaves by the Tartars, or butchered, to ſatisfy the rage and fury of the Turks.

The army under the command of general Romanzow having croſſed the Neiſter, and marched on ſlowly towards the Pruth, a river which riſes in Poland, croſſes Moldavia, and falls into the Danube. From thence he continued his march to Jaſſy, the capital of Moldavia, about two hundred miles eaſt of Choczim. Great part of the country through which he paſſed was little better than a deſart, being totally deſtitute of water; ſo that they were obliged to carry that neceſſary article along with them. Such impediments may eaſily account for the ſlowneſs of general Romanzow, who ſeemed to move in a ſimilar direction with count Panin, who was at the head of an army on the banks of the Neiſter, his deſign being to lay ſiege to the important fortreſs of Bender.

Every thing ſeemed now to give way to the Ruſſian power; and ſeveral detachments of the Turks having been cut off, the grand vizier reſolved to venture on an engagement. About eight o'clock in the evening, both armies came in ſight of each other, near the banks of the Pruth, and the Tartars were drawn up on the left of the Ruſſians; but ſoon afterwards, they ſpread themſelves out into ſmall parties, in order to cut off a convoy of waggons, containing the proviſions for the Ruſſian army.

In ſome ſituations, and under ſeveral circumſtances, boldneſs is prudence, and then it is that great minds are diſcovered, by their actions, from mere common abilities. General Romanzow was one of thoſe great men; for had a leſs experienced commander been at the head of the Ruſſian army, they might have been totally cut off. The Ruſſians had been very much weakened by ſending out detached parties, and therefore it ſeemed little better than madneſs to venture on an engagement. The general, however, confiding in the goodneſs of his troops, and the confidence they had in him, from a long ſeries of ſucceſſes, reſolved to attack the enemy next morning. Accordingly they began to move, in order of battle, about day-break; and, as ſoon as it was light, the general found, that, notwithſtanding the vaſt ſuperiority of numbers, the Turks had thrown up ſtrong entrenchments before their camp. This did not in the leaſt damp the ſpirits of the Ruſſian general, for he had formed a reſolution, and, let the conſequences be what they would, he perſiſted in going through with it. His ſituation, indeed, was truly critical; for, had he been defeated, the army under the command of general Panin would have been taken in the rear, and the heavy artillery muſt have fallen into the hands of the Turks.

The Turks, notwithſtanding their having thrown up entrenchments, no ſooner ſaw the Ruſſians advancing, than they marched out to meet them; but the good order and regular diſcipline of the Ruſſians bore down all oppoſition, and they drove the Turks back to their entrenchments. The battle now became dreadful; for the grand vizier ſeeing the critical ſituation he was in, made a ſally at the head of his beſt troops; but the Ruſſians, with their bayonets, forced them back, and took poſſeſſion of the firſt entrenchment. The battle now became more bloody than ever; and, after the Turks had uſed every effort to retrieve the honour of the day, the Ruſſian diſcipline overcame, and all the entrenchments were taken.

The route now became general; the Turks fled on every ſide; while the grand vizier, ſeeing the battle totally loſt, made the beſt of his way for the Danube, which was diſtant about twenty-four miles.

This was one of the completeſt victories that we read of in hiſtory; for the whole camp equipage, with the tents, one hundred and forty-three pieces of cannon, and above ſeven thouſand carriages loaded with proviſions, fell into the hands of the Ruſſians. Seven thouſand Turks were left dead on the field; many were made priſoners; while the reſt were purſued as far as the Danube, in which ſome thouſands of them were drowned.

While the Ruſſians, under general Romanzow, were gaining victories every day in Moldavia, count Panin laid ſiege to Bender, which the Turks had fortified in the ſtrongeſt manner. The garriſon made a moſt vigorous defence; and, in the compaſs of fourteen days from the opening of the trenches, they ſallied out ſeven different times upon the Ruſſians. The governor was ſo overcome with grief and deſpair when he heard that the grand vizier had been defeated, that he took poiſon, and ſo put an end to his own life. The garriſon, determined to hold out to the laſt, made choice of another in his room, who behaved with great bravery; for the ſiege was carried on with unremitted fury, and the place as gallantly defended, till the Ruſſians, tired out with delays, reſolved to make one vigorous effort, which was done by three different columns in the night of the ſeventh of September.

The walls had been undermined, and a vaſt quantity of gunpowder put into the aperture; which being ſet fire to, blew up in the moſt dreadful manner; while the different columns having joined each other, entered the breach ſword in hand, and carried deſtruction along with them. A moſt dreadful carnage enſued; for the Ruſſians ſpared none who came in their way, and the greateſt part of the town was reduced to aſhes.

The misfortunes of the Turks were not confined to the Danube or the Neiſter; for the moſt northerly, as well as the moſt ſoutherly parts of their dominions in Europe, ſeemed doomed to all the calamities of war. The time ſeemed to be arrived, when the moſt wretched ſtate of their government, which, for many years, had ſuffered their military, as well as their naval force, to fall into decay and ruin, ſhould be puniſhed both by ſea and land. The conduct of the Turks, in ſuffering themſelves to ſleep into a ſtupid ſecurity, is ſimilar to an error which all great empires have fallen into at one time or other. For the truth of this, we have no more to do than to turn to the hiſtories of thoſe great empires which once made ſuch diſtinguiſhing figures, but are now only known by name. They grew up to a ſtate of maturity by virtue and valour; their middle ages were diſtinguiſhed by well regulated inſtitutions; but ſloth, effeminacy, and the relaxation of every moral obligation, undermined their foundations, and brought on their ruin.

The Ruſſian fleet, the firſt belonging to that empire that ever paſſed the Sound, ſailed from England, and paſſing tne ſtreights of Gibraltar, arrived at Port-Mahon, in the iſland of Minorca, in a very ſhattered and ſickly cendition. There they received all that friendly aſſiſtance for which the Engliſh are ſo juſtly celebrated; and the ſalutary air, with the uſe of freſh proviſions, ſoon reſtored the men to health; ſo that the fleet was enabled to weigh anchor, and proceed on its voyage. In the mean time, application was made to the maritime ſtates of Italy, to know on what terms they would act with reſpect to the Ruſſians; and whether, in caſe of their being reduced to diſtreſs, they would allow them ſhelter in their harbours. Thoſe ſtates gave but a very reſerved and equivocal anſwer, till at laſt preſſed to it, they promiſed to allow ſome of them to come in, under certain reſtrictions.

During the latter part of the laſt year, ſome Ruſſian officers had been employed in carrying on a negociation with the Greeks, which was no difficult matter to bring about, ſeeing they were both of the ſame religion, and had been long oppreſſed by the Turks. They now hoped to ſhake off the yoke of ſlavery; and their hopes roſe to a pitch of extravagance equal to that of the Jews, when they imagined the Meſſiah was come among them.

Count Orlow, who commanded the Ruſſian fleet, ſet ſail from Minorca in the beginning of February; and, after a very dangerous and tedious voyage, arrived at Cape Metapan, the ancient promontory of Tenarus. This country, the ancient and famous Peloponneſſus, once the ſeat of philoſophers and poets, being all claſſical ground, is too well known to require any deſcription. Indeed, if it did, modern travellers can ſupply that defect, though their accounts are far inferior to thoſe of the ancients.

The Ruſſian admiral having landed the forces which he had on board, at Maina, the capital of the ancient Sparta, the people of the country, the deſcendants of the ancient Lacedemonians, who ſtill retained ſome of the ſpirit of their anceſtors, flocked in great numbers to join his ſtandard. The other Greeks in general followed their example; for, in general, the inhabitants of the Morea only waited for an opportunity of aſſerting their freedom.

Arcadia, Miſitra, and many other places, were ſoon taken; and the Greeks maſſacred every Turk whom they laid hold of, without regard to age or ſex. From this we may infer, that although the Greeks aſſume to themſelves the name of Chriſtians, they are deſtitute of the firſt principles of humanity; for whatever cruelty had been inflicted on them by the Turkiſh government, yet that did not warrant their murdering individuals.

The Turkiſh governor of Meſſalougi finding himſelf unable to defend the place any longer, and expecting no mercy from the Ruſſians, put his perſon under the protection of the Greek Syndic, the chief magiſtrate of the town; but no ſooner had the villainous Syndic got him in his power, than he cauſed him to be put to death.

Nor was this unnatural fury confined to the continent; for revenge, novelty, and the hope of plunder, operated every where, and even extended to the iſlands, where the moſt horrid murders were committed, with circumſtances of the moſt ſavage barbarity. Three Turkiſh ſhips, with ſome recruits on board, for the ſervice of the army on the continent, having put into the iſland of Milone, one of the ancient Cyclades, the greateſt part of the crew going on ſhore, were all barbarouſly murdered. At Maina, count Orlow publiſhed a manifeſto in the name of the empreſs of Ruſſia, wherein, among other things, it is expreſsly declared, that ſhe looked upon herſelf as under a religious obligation to ſet the Greeks at liberty from the Turkiſh ſlavery, promiſing, at the ſame time, protection to all thoſe who would join her army, and threatening military execution to ſuch as refuſed: for it is remarkable in the Ruſſians, that they ſeldom publiſh a proclamation that is not clogged with ſome oppreſſive mark or condition.

From Maina count Orlow ſailed for Corom, a ſtrong town at the extremity of the peninſula; but the fortifications of it had been long neglected, like moſt other towns in the Turkiſh empire, ſo that it was ſoon taken. The harbour was good, and capable of admitting a great number of ſhips; and therefore the Ruſſian admiral ordered that it ſhould be their place of general rendezvous.

Petras was taken in the latter end of March, it being one of the moſt important places in the Morea. It is celebrated in hiſtory for being the metropolitan city of Claventia, and is ſituated on that arm of the gulph which ſeparates it from the ancient Livadia, about ſixty miles weſt of Corinth, and one hundred and twenty north-weſt of Miſitra. This great and once flouriſhing city was not able to make any defence; and the Greeks, who accompanied the Ruſſian army, no ſooner made a breach in the walls, than they broke in, and murdered the innocent inhabitants, without any diſtinction of age or ſex. Such as could make their eſcape from the hands of the murderers, (for they merit no better name) took ſhelter in the caſtle, which the Ruſſians and Greeks inſtantly beſieged. The Greeks, however, were but of little ſervice to the Ruſſians, for they minded plunder more than military diſcipline.

In the mean time, a body of Albanians and Turks having paſſed the Iſthmus, marched to its relief, and engaged the Ruſſians in the moſt furious manner. At the ſame time, the governor made a ſally, and a mine burſting, the city was ſet on fire, and burnt down to the ground. The Turks took a ſevere revenge on the Greeks for their cruelties, for they put every one to the ſword, not even ſparing their prieſts at the altar. All the foreign conſuls had made their eſcape, except the ſon of the Engliſh conſul, who, on this memorable occaſion, acted with ſuch ſpirit and humanity, as will ever do honour to his memory. This young gentleman had ſhut himſelf up in his father's houſe, which he looked upon as a ſanctuary, conſiſtent with the eſtabliſhed laws of nations; and took under his protection ſeventy perſons, ſome of whom were ladies of diſtinction. In the heighth of the confuſion, a body of Albanians, armed with axes, came to break open the door; but he repreſenting to them that he belonged to a nation that was in alliance with the Grand Seignior, they, in the moſt generous and humane manner, carried him, with all thoſe under his protection, to the caſtle. There, however, their fears were redoubled, for the firſt ſcene which preſented itſelf to their eyes, was a heap of mangled bodies, and ſeveral Turkiſh executioners, according to their forms, employed in cutting off the heads of all the Greek priſoners as faſt as they were brought in. The Engliſh gentleman, with his companions, would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not the governor, who knew him, arrived at that inſtant, and taken him, with all his companions, under his protection. The ſame night they got on board a veſſel in the harbour, which conveyed them ſafely to Zante, to the great joy of the Engliſh conſul, who imagined that he had been killed.

From this time forward the Greeks began to ſuffer in their turn, for thoſe cruelties which, in their rage, they had inflicted on the Turks. A large body of them having advanced to the iſthmus of Corinth, in order to croſs over into Achaia, the Turks came up with them, killed above two thouſand, and took a great number of them priſoners, whoſe heads were inſtantly cut off. All Greece, now called the Morea, exhibited murder, famine, and putrified bodies in every place. The Greeks and Turks were equally cruel to each other, nor could two meet together without one being killed.

Indeed, it is, in many ſtriking inſtances, painful to treat of theſe cruelties, or even of this war in general, which has, through all its different parts, been ſullied and diſgraced by acts of ferocity, oppreſſion, and cruelty, which are happily but little known in the middle or weſtern parts of Europe. The enmities of theſe poliſhed nations are tempered with a generoſity and humanity which alleviate, and, in a great meaſure, conceal the deformity and horrors of war; and a liſt of the killed and wounded after an engagement, cauſes little more emotion than the ſight of an adjutant's roll would before it.

Soon after the Greeks had been defeated in the Iſthmus of Corinth, the baſſaw of Boſnia arrived in the Morea, at the head of thirty thouſand men, moſtly Albanians; and he ordered all the Greeks who were found in arms, or any way diſtant from their villages, to be inſtantly put to death. The Greek archbiſhop of Trippolizza, with many other perſons of great diſtinction, ſhared the ſame fate, under pretence that they had ſtirred up the people to revolt.

The chief force of the Ruſſians was now, in concert with ſome Greeks, engaged in the ſiege of Modon, about one hundred miles weſt of Corinth. It is a place of great ſtrength, with a caſtle, and an exceeding good harbour; ſo that, while the Ruſſian army attacked it by land, the fleet ſeconded their operations by ſea. Had they taken this important place, they would have been able to maintain a footing in the peninſula, at leaſt till ſome reinforcements came to their aſſiſtance. But a body of Turks and Albanians having croſſed the peninſula, attacked the beſiegers with great fury, and were ſeconded by a vigorous ſally made by the governor. It now appeared evident that the ſpirit of the ancient Spartans had forſaken theſe their degenerate deſcendants; for the Greeks, diſpirited by their late overthrow, which taught them the difference between maſſacring an innocent multitude of people, and engaging in battle with an enemy, abandoned their poſts as ſoon as they were attacked, and were cut in pieces without reſiſtance. The Ruſſians, however, made a noble ſtand, and fought in the moſt courageous manner, to protect the cowardly Greeks, who, if they had acted with only a common degree of reſolution, a complete victory might have been obtained. But at laſt the Ruſſians were overpowered by numbers, and obliged to retreat to the ſhore, under the protection of their ſhips.

The Albanians and Turks, now fluſhed with the thoughts of ſucceſs, gave themſelves up to plundering the camp; which the Ruſſians obſerving, turned upon them, and routed them with great ſlaughter; ſo that they once more got poſſeſſion of their camp and battery. This ſucceſs brought ſome more of the Greeks to their aſſiſtance, and now the ſiege was renewed with redoubled vigour. The Ruſſians were now convinced that no time was to be loſt, and that they muſt endeavour to take it before any freſh forces could come up. Accordingly, an attack was made; but the Greeks, who were quite diſpirited, ſeparated themſelves from the Ruſſians, who were again obliged to abandon the place.

During theſe tranſactions in the Morea, the Ruſſian fleet was reinforced by more ſhips, which had ſailed from England in the beginning of the year; and both being joined, they came up with the Turkiſh fleet in the channel of Scio, which divides Natolia, in the Leſſer Aſia, from Europe. The Turkiſh fleet was conſiderably ſuperior to that of the Ruſſians, and the engagement began with great fury. A Turkiſh and a Ruſſian ſhip got faſtened together, and both blew up with a dreadful exploſion, ſo that only a few of the hands on board were ſaved. The dreadful fate of theſe ſhips occaſioned a panic on both ſides for ſome time; but the engagement being again renewed, it continued till night ſeparated them, without any material advantage on either ſide.

As ſoon as it was dark, the Turkiſh admiral, contrary to the advice of his braveſt officers, ordered the cables to be cut, and then ſailed into a ſmall bay on the coaſt of Natolia. This was a moſt imprudent ſtep, for the Ruſſian fleet ſurrounded them in the morning, and came to an anchor beſide them. Admiral Elphinſton then began to make preparations to ſend in four fire-ſhips among them; but this being a piece of ſervice with which the Ruſſians were but little acquainted, they ſeemed very unwilling to engage in it. An Engliſh lieutenant then undertook the dangerous expedient, and commodore Greig, another officer of the ſame nation, undertook to conduct the ſhips that were to cover them. At twelve at night commodore Greig, with four ſhips of the line and two frigates, approached the mouth of the harbour, and engaged the enemy within four hundred yards. A moſt dreadful cannonade begun and laſted an hour, when, about one o'clock, a ſignal was given for Mr. Dugdale, the Engliſh lieutenant, to run in with the fire-ſhips, which he inſtantly performed, and bore down upon the Turkiſh fleet. At the ſame time a ſhot having ſet the rigging of one of the Turkiſh ſhips on fire, it added greatly to the confuſion, in a place where they had ſcarce room to act. It was impoſſible for the brave lieutenant to keep the Ruſſians in order, and at laſt they flung themſelves into the boat, and left him on board alone. Preſence of mind, and that courage by which the Britiſh ſeamen have been ſo long diſtinguiſhed, enabled him to ſurmount every difficulty; for having laſhed the helm, he ſet fire to the ſhip, and then threw himſelf into the ſea, and ſwam to one of the Ruſſian ſhips.

The three other ſhips took fire at the ſame time, and ruſhing into the center of the Turkiſh fleet, the whole was conſumed, except one ſhip the Ruſſians towed off. They then bombarded the town, in which was a ſtrong caſtle; but a ſhot from one of the Ruſſian ſhips having ſet fire to the powder magazine, the whole blew up, and the place was reduced to a heap of rubbiſh. Thus through the obſtinacy of the Turkiſh admiral of a fleet, a caſtle and a town that exiſted at one o'clock in the morning, was, in eight hours after, reduced to a heap of rubbiſh! It is ſaid, that the Turks loſt ſix thouſand men on this memorable occaſion, and ſuch of the ſailors as had the good fortune to make their eſcape, murdered all the Greeks that came in their way, and even attempted to ſet fire to their cities.

Theſe ruffians, to whoſe rage nothing could ſet bounds, marched as far as Smyrna, where they murdered three hundred Greeks; and had it not been for the interpoſition of the Janizaries, they would have ſerved all the European merchants in the ſame barbarous manner, and even ſet fire to the city. In the mean time, the Turkiſh admiral was beheaded, by order of the grand-ſeignior, for having run his ſhips into a place where they became an eaſy prey to the Ruſſians. Indeed it would ſeem, that he had been no way acquainted with naval affairs, for no admiral ought ever to come near land till he is in a manner ſure of victory.

The Ruſſians, who were now triumphant at ſea, blocked up the paſſage to the Dardanelles, and interrupted every ſhip that attempted to paſs them, without any regard to the nations to which they belonged; but when they found that they had no intention of aſſiſting the Turks, they ſuffered them to proceed to ſome other port. Count Orlow, the Ruſſian admiral, preferred the brave lieutenant Dugdale to the command of the Turkiſh ſhip that had been ſaved, and which carried ſixty-two braſs guns; and commodore Greig was made an admiral. The Greeks, filled with revenge againſt their cruel maſters the Turks, murdered the people in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles; ſo that the whole Archipelago was filled with their barbarities.

The ancient and once famous city of Smyrna, where many great men have been born, and which, for two centuries, has been a place of great trade, was now in a very critical ſituation. The inhabitants expected to be attacked by the Ruſſians every day, and the foreign European merchants, who had factories there, gave up all for loſt. It was a moſt dangerous expedient for them to apply to the Ruſſian admiral, leſt the Turks ſhould have been jealous of them; but at laſt the common danger cemented them together for their mutual ſafety, and the Turks joined with them in the application. Accordingly, an Engliſh merchant was ſent to count Orlow, whom he found engaged in the ſiege of Lemmos, and by whom he was told, that he had ſtrict orders to protect the Chriſtians of all nations, but more particularly the Engliſh; becauſe there was a treaty of peace and commerce at that time ſubſiſting between them and the Engliſh. He diſmiſſed him with marks of the greateſt politeneſs, and told him, that he and the other gentlemen in the factories might make themſelves quite eaſy, as no harm would happen to them.

During the whole of this year, France was torn with inteſtine diviſions. The arbitrary proceedings at court were ſuch, that the parliaments in the provinces refuſed to regiſter the edicts. The king wanted money to ſupport his extravagance, and the moſt illegal taxes were impoſed on the people, at a time when the neceſſaries of life were ſo ſcarce that the people were, in a manner, ſtarving. The parliaments, on this occaſion, acted with integrity and firmneſs, and nothing could force them to give a ſanction to what was both unjuſt and oppreſſive. Dragoons, however, extorted that which faithful magiſtrates refuſed to grant; the taxes were raiſed by force, and the members of the different parliaments were ſent to different priſons, where they were not ſuffered to converſe with their friends or relations. In a word, the ſtate of France, during this year, was the moſt miſerable that could have been imagined. Juſtice was obſtructed, the decrees of the courts, that ſeemed to affect the payment of the oppreſſive taxes, were all ordered to be erazed, ſoldiers were quartered on ſuch of the counſellors as had ſpoken boldly in defence of the people; and it may juſtly be ſaid, that all France was groaning under military power.

Italy, which has often been the theatre of war, now enjoyed perfect tranquillity; and the different ſtates ſeemed to vie with each other in promoting commerce and agriculture. Several regulations were made with reſpect to the clergy, for the Italians are far from being ſuch bigots as they were formerly. Indeed, they have in that inſtance acted with moderation and prudence, ſo as not to do any thing violently; and there is no doubt but that will in the end bring about a general reformation.

The pope, by his good ſenſe and the peculiar happineſs of his temper, acted with ſuch moderation that theſe ſtates, who were on bad terms with his predeceſſor, freely acknowledged his power in all things of a ſpiritual nature. By theſe means enmity died away, and the bleſſings of peace were diffuſed from Sicily to the Alps.

Portugal, that had long been at enmity with the ſee of Rome, now admitted a nuncio from the pope; ſo that by prudence and moderation this great eccleſiaſtic was doing more than ever could have taken place by the thunders of the vatican. He aboliſhed many ridiculous cuſtoms, and on the whole ſeemed to have nothing ſo much in view as the reducing the Roman catholic religion to a rational ſyſtem.

In Corſica, during this year, the wretched inhabitants felt all the ſeverity of a French deſpotic government. Many of them ſtill refuſed to ſubmit, and ſuch of theſe unhappy people as were taken, were inſtantly put to death. Some of them were tranſported to France; but this was little more than ſhifting the ſcene: for as in Corſica they beheld the ruin of their country, ſo in France they ſaw a whole nation of people ruined. But here their ſuffering did not end; for ſuch as were brought to France, after a journey of ſix hundred miles on foot from Marſeilles to Breſt, were put on board ſeveral veſſels and ſent as ſlaves to the Weſt-Indies. What havock has the ambition of tyrants made among the children of men!

This year a war was likely to have broke out between Great-Britain and Spain, on account of the following affair:

In the year 1592 captain Davies, who commanded an Engliſh man of war, failed to the South Seas, where he diſcovered ſome iſlands, ſince called Falklands; but little notice was taken of them for more than a century, till commodore Anſon, in his voyage round the world, diſcovered the importance they would be of to us, if properly cultivated. Accordingly, ſoon after the late peace, when lord Anſon was at the head of the admiralty, he mentioned the affair in council, and it was propoſed to ſend out ſome frigates to viſit them. This ſcheme, however, was not ſo well conducted, but the Spaniards got notice of it before it could be carried into execution; and ſuch remonſtrances were made by their ambaſſador at our court, that it was again laid aſide.

It was again revived, and in 1764 commodore Byron was ſent out with a ſmall ſquadron to make diſcoveries, and, if poſſible, eſtabliſh a ſettlement on the coaſt of Patagonia. During that voyage, he took poſſeſſion of Falklands iſlands in the name of his Britannic majeſty, with all the forms uſed on ſuch occaſions.

Much about this time the French, ſtimulated by their loſſes during the war, undertook an expedition of a ſimilar nature, namely, to make diſcoveries in the South Seas; and the care of it was committed to one M. de Bouganville, colonel of a regiment of foot. This gentleman entered into this adventure with all that life and ſpirit ſo peculiar to his countrymen. Having fitted out a frigate of twenty guns, with a ſloop to carry proviſions, he took on board one hundred ſeamen, and about one hundred and fifty people, who choſe to try their fortune in that part of the world. The French ſhips ſet ſail from St. Malo, and arrived at the Canaries, where they were kindly received by the Spaniards, who gave them every ſort of aſſiſtance. From thence they proceeded to the river Plata, and took in freſh proviſions, the Spaniards ſtill continuing to treat them with every mark of reſpect. At length, they came to Falklands Iſlands, where they formed an eſtabliſhment, and built a ſmall fort.

Theſe French adventurers had formed the moſt ſanguine hopes from the diſcovery of theſe iſlands, but they did not anſwer their expectations; for it coſt them more money to ſupport their ſettlement than the profits ariſing from it could afford; ſo that they gave it up to the Spaniards in the moſt formal manner.

Theſe iſlands are ſituated in latitude 51 ſouth, and about one hundred leagues on this ſide the ſtreights of Magellan. The ſettlement, which had been given up by the French to the Spaniards, was on one of the iſlands that lay to the weſt, and was called Port Solidad; and Port Egmont, belonging to the Engliſh, was one of the iſlands to the eaſtward. It is not certainly known, that theſe ſettlers knew of each other for ſome time, and certain it is, that in commodore's Byron's account of them, he mentions nothing of any ſettlement but the Engliſh one at Port Egmont. However, in the year 1769, we had a frigate and a ſloop upon that ſtation, and captain Hunt, in the Tamar frigate, being on a cruiſe, fell in with a Spaniſh ſchooner belonging to Port Solidad, and according to his orders, commanded the Spaniſh captain to depart, becauſe theſe iſlands were the property of Great-Britain. In two days afterwards, the captain came on board the Tamar frigate with a letter to captain Hunt, written by the governor of Port Solidad, telling him, that if he had been driven in there by ſtreſs of weather, he was ready to give him every aſſiſtance; but if he came there in violation of the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties, he had far better depart immediately. Captain Hunt, not in the leaſt intimidated with theſe threatenings, aſſerted the right his Britannic majeſty had to theſe iſlands, and warned him to depart from them, giving him ſix months for that purpoſe. The Spaniſh officer entered a formal proteſt againſt captain Hunt, and declared, that if he offered any inſult to the ſettlement at Port Solidad, or removed from theſe iſlands, he ſhould conſider it as a breach of the peace, and tranſmit an account thereof to Spain. Soon after this affair, two Spaniſh frigates of conſiderable force arrived at Port Egmont, under pretence that they wanted freſh water; and the commander in chief ſent notice to captain Hunt, that he was aſtoniſhed to ſee the Engliſh flag hoiſted in an iſland that belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. He charged captain Hunt with violating the peace; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would ſend an account thereof to Spain, that his maſter might aſſert his right to thoſe iſlands which had been made over to him by treaty.

Captain Hunt ſtill continued to found his poſſeſſion on the claim of right, juſtified his conduct by the orders of his ſovereign, and again warned the Spaniards to depart from theſe iſlands. The frigates continued eight days at Port Egmont, and were ſupplied by our people with water: the captain and officers behaved with civility, but they declined going on ſhore though they were ſeveral times invited. As theſe tranſactions ſeemed to indicate an approaching rupture, captain Hunt ſet ſail for England, and arriving at Plymouth on the third of June, ſent an expreſs to the lords of the admiralty. The Swift and Favourite ſloops of war, each bearing ſixteen guns, were left to take care of the ſettlement; but the Swift having ſailed as far as the ſtreights of Magellan, was overſet, and ſuch of the crew as could get into the boat, undertook a voyage of three weeks, which brought them to Port Egmont, after experiencing an innumerable variety of hardſhips. Five Spaniſh frigates arrived at Port Egmont, and captain Farmer, not doubting but they came with hoſtile intentions, reſolved to be upon his guard. He accordingly hoiſted his flag, which the Spaniſh commodore ſeeing, fired two ſhots, and being aſked what were his reaſons for ſo doing, he ſaid they were only by way of ſignals.

In the mean time captain Farmer wrote to the Spaniſh commodore, that as he had received the refreſhments he wanted, he was obliged in the name, and by the authority of his maſter, to command him to depart, and totally evacuate all thoſe iſlands known by the name of Falklands. In anſwer to this letter, the commodore put captain Farmer in mind of his great power, and how eaſy it was for him to deſtroy their defenceleſs ſettlement. He begged that he and the other Engliſh officers would not force him to any extremities, but depart quietly from the place, as the iſlands belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. Next day he wrote again, both to captain Farmer and captain Maltby, telling them, that if they would depart peaceably they ſhould have leave to take all they had along with them from the ſettlement, and what they could not take, he ſhould give them a receipt for, that the whole affair might be ſettled by their reſpective courts. But on the other hand, if they refuſed to comply, he would, contrary to his inclinations, be obliged to obey his orders, by attack- their ſettlement both by ſea and land, and that he would ſpread deſolation every where before him; for he had, under his command, a large body of marines, beſides a train of heavy artillery.

He concluded by aſſuring them, that if they did not, in fifteen minutes after the receipt of his letter, give him a plain and favourable anſwer, he would immediately commence hoſtilities; and, at the ſame time, deſired them to think of the dreadful conſequences which their obſtinacy would be productive of to the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty.

To theſe, and all his other menaces, the Engliſh captains returned for anſwer, that words are not always conſidered as acts of hoſtilities; and that they could not believe that he would, in a time of profound peace, when the greateſt harmony ſubſiſted between the two nations, put his threats in execution: that he did not doubt but he was thoroughly convinced, that the king of Great-Britain, their maſter, was capable of demanding ſatisfaction throughout every part of the globe where any inſult was offered to his flag; and therefore they were, in conſequence of their orders, obliged to defend the place to the laſt extremity. Accordingly the Spaniſh commodore ordered the frigates to row cloſe to the ſhore, directly oppoſite the Block-houſe, where there was only a ſmall battery; and at night captain Maltby brought fifty ſeamen, belonging to the Favourite, on ſhore, with two ſix pounders, ten ſwivels, and a quantity of ſmall-arms and ammunition. Next morning, part of the Spaniſh troops and artillery landed about a mile to the northward of the Block-houſe; and when they had advanced about half a mile, the reſt of the boats, with the troops and artillery, put off from one of the Spaniſh frigates, and rowed right in for the cove, being covered by the fire from the frigates, whoſe ſhot went over the Blockhouſe. The Engliſh ſeamen, who were then on ſhore, fired ſome ſmall ſhot; but ſeeing the utter impoſſibility of defending the ſettlement, and the Spaniards having broke through all the limits of peace, even to the actual commencement of hoſtilities, ſo that their conduct could neither be denied nor explained away, our officers, as they had judiciouſly led them to this open avowal of their conduct, and had, at the ſame time, ſupported the honour of their own country, as far as the means in their power would admit of, with the ſame propriety preferred ſaving the valuable lives of their people; and leaving the injury to be redreſſed by thoſe in power, they thought it moſt prudent to hang out a flag of truce, in order to know what terms of capitulation the Spaniſh commodore would grant.

All the conditions which he would grant were, that the Engliſh ſhould immediately, or as ſoon as poſſible, ſo as it did not exceed forty days, remove from the ſettlement, and what ſtores they left behind them ſhould be produced as ſoon as orders for that purpoſe arrived from Spain. This was one of the greateſt inſults, perhaps, that had ever been offered to the Britiſh flag; but the Engliſh, who had not ſtrength ſufficient to defend themſelves, were obliged to comply, and in September arrived at Portſmouth.

The navy of Great-Britain was then in a very indifferent condition; and political debates ran ſo high, that people in general were diſſatisfied with the conduct of the miniſtry. Preſs warrants had been iſſued for raiſing ſeamen, but the legality of them was, in ſeveral places, called in queſtion. In the city of London, Mr. Croſby, the lord-mayor, refuſed to back the preſs warrants; Mr. alderman Wilkes diſcharged a man who had been impreſſed; and although the opinion of council was taken on this important ſubject, yet, among the more ſenſible and judicious, the practice itſelf was looked upon as inconſiſtent with the nature of the Britiſh conſtitution.

In the mean time, ſuch as were averſe to a war, or dreaded the conſequences of it, looked back with reſentment to the laſt peace, and to thoſe who had adviſed the making of it. All the arguments made uſe of in defence of it were treated with the utmoſt contempt, and the whole was conſidered as a meaſure which, in its conſequences, muſt for ever diſhonour the Britiſh nation. Indeed, many ſober perſons, whoſe minds were free from paſſion or prejudice, and who, judging of the diſputes between the rival nations only by the ſame equitable and diſintereſted principles which ſhould at all times take place between private perſons, had not, at that time, in general, diſapproved of the conditions of peace, could not now refrain from the utmoſt indignation, at beholding the flagrant inſult we had received from an enemy we had ſo lately in our power to chaſtiſe, and from thinking that thoſe who ſaid, that the fruits of one of the moſt glorious and ſucceſsful wars mentioned in hiſtory, had been bartered away for an inglorious and inſecure peace, had but too much reaſon on their ſide; and therefore there was no wonder that the people ſhould find fault with the meaſures of adminiſtration.

In this ſtate of anxiety, doubt, and expectation, all people longed, in the moſt eager manner, for the meeting of parliament. No change had taken place in adminiſtration during the receſs; and as lord North had ſucceſsfully weathered all the ſtorms of the winter, ſupported by a prodigious majority in both houſes, he ſeemed now to be as ſecurely fixed in his ſeat at the head of the treaſury, as the precarious circumſtances of the times would admit of. The ſtate of the different parties in oppoſition had not hitherto ſuffered any material change. The death of Mr. Grenville, which happened in the beginning of November, having left that party to which he belonged without a leader, ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of them, and who appeared the moſt ſanguine in oppoſition, went over to the court. The party that adhered to the marquis of Rockingham, and who were called the Whig party, ſtill adhered to their former principles: and ſuch as were attached to the earl of Chatham, earl Temple, and the earl of Shelburne, conſiſting of a mixture of whigs and tories, generally coincided with the Rockingham party.

On the thirteenth of November, both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter, and was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne. He told them, that the Spaniſh governor of Buenos Ayres had acted in ſuch a manner as was inconſiſtent with the honour of Great-Britain, and demanded the utmoſt ſatisfaction: that, under theſe circumſtances, an immediate demand had been made for proper ſatisfaction, in conſequence of the injury received: that the neceſſary preparations had been made, without loſs of time, in order to be enabled to obtain juſtice, in caſe the requiſition to the court of Spain ſhould fail in procuring it. An aſſurance was given that theſe preparations ſhould not be diſcontinued, until proper reparation had been made; and that ſufficient proofs ſhould be given, that all other powers on the continent diſapproved of ſuch proceedings. He ſaid he had called them together ſo early, that they might be ready to aſſiſt him with the beſt of their advice, and provide for the honour and ſecurity of the nation. With reſpect to the colonies in America, it was obſerved, that many of the factious people had deſiſted from thoſe combinations into which they had inadvertently entered, and which had been attended with many fatal conſequences to their peaceable fellow ſubjects: that the people of Boſton, and, in general, the inhabitants of the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay, could not yet be brought into a proper ſtate of obedience, but continued in carrying on the ſame violent and unwarrantable practices as before. He added, that the eſtimates for the preſent year would naturally exceed the former; and that it would be neither conſulting the inclinations nor the intereſts of his people, if they ſhould decline any expence that ſhould ſeem neceſſary towards promoting the national honour: that as to foreign meaſures, no doubt was held, that there could be any other conteſt, than who ſhould appear moſt forward in ſupport of the common cauſe, in upholding the reputation, and promoting the proſperity of the kingdom. He concluded by telling them, that the crown had no intereſt ſeparate from that of the people; that they were all members of the ſame body, and, conſiſtent with the order of nature and the laws of ſociety, they muſt ſtand or fall together.

The addreſſes were the moſt ſpirited that had been preſented for ſome years; and the moſt unreſerved aſſurances were given, that every degree of requiſite ſupport ſhould be chearfully granted. The moſt unreſerved confidence was placed in his majeſty, that he would never be induced, by a miſtaken tenderneſs for the preſent eaſe of the people, to ſacrifice their more eſſential and laſting intereſts. The commons concluded by a declaration, that if any hopes had been conceived, or it ſhould have been any where ſurmiſed, that there were any ſuch differences ſubſiſting among the people, as could, in the leaſt degree, abate the ardour of their affectionate attachment to his majeſty, or prevent their joining, as one man, in maintaining unſullied the luſtre of the crown, and preſerving undiminiſhed the rights of the people, they would, by their proceedings, convince the world how falſe and ſcandalous all ſuch ſurmiſes were; and make it manifeſt, that, whenever they were called upon in the cauſe of their king and country, there would be but one heart and one voice among them.

Although theſe addreſſes were carried by a vaſt majority, there aroſe conſiderable debates upon them. It was ſaid by thoſe in oppoſition, that as one inſult is always the forerunner of others, ſo the preſent outrage offered by Spain was a natural conſequence of our paſſive and ſhameful conduct with regard to Corſica: that the ſpeech was an oſtentatious diſplay of miniſterial conduct, and the addreſs an approbation of it: that before ſuch a public approbation was given, it was neceſſary to know what that conduct had been, which merited ſuch applauſes: that it was neceſſary to know what the Spaniards had done, and what previous information our miniſtry had received of their deſigns: that by our conduct for twelve months paſt, it ſeemed as if we had not an enemy in the world; and yet, by the ſpeech, it was evident that a war was apprehended: the bad ſtate of our navy, and the defenceleſs manner in which the valuable iſland of Jamaica was left, were much inſiſted on, and with great force of argument: that, independent of any private intelligence, the accounts publicly avowed to have been received on the third of June, that the Spaniards had warned our people to depart from their ſettlement on Falklands Iſlands, was, in itſelf, a ſufficient indication of their ill deſigns, and of what was naturally to follow; but between that and the twenty-ſecond of September, when our people brought the account of the inſult on our flag, what had been done to put us in a ſtate of ſecurity at home, or enable us to protect our dominions abroad? Were the regiments completed, or was the navy manned and put in a proper condition? None of all theſe things were done, and yet we are to return thanks to the miniſtry, not for any thing, but only becauſe they have not done ſomething worſe than we are yet acquainted with.

It was farther inſiſted, that while the rights of the people were violated at home, it was abſurd to expect ſuch unanimity among them as was neceſſary to ſupport the honour of the nation againſt any foreign power. That part of the ſpeech which mentions the governor of Buenos Ayres, was moſt ſeverely cenſured, and even ridiculed, both without and within doors. It was ſaid, Why ſhould an officer, who acted only under command, be conſidered, inſtead of the king his maſter, as the principal in an injury offered to this great nation? The anſwer is evident; the ſame temporizing, mean and cowardly policy, prevails, which beheld the ſeizure of Corſica, in defiance of faith and of treaties; and now hopes, under this ſubterfuge, to find ſome means of prolonging its exiſtence, though at the price of the national honour and dignity.

Upon the whole, it was aſſerted, in poſitive terms, that the conduct of our miniſtry had neither been honeſt in the deſign, nor able in the execution; they had loſt the confidence of the people, and yet imagined they would ſupport them: that they had threatened the colonies with unrelenting ſeverity, in purſuit of an unconſtitutional meaſure, and yet ſuppoſe that we ſhall ſuffer nothing from an alienation of their affection: that Ireland was ruled with a rod of iron, and yet they conſtantly declared that they were not making ſtrides towards arbitrary power. Laſtly, that, with reſpect to the deſigns of our enemies, they had been totally blind and improvident, and yet we were in danger.

In anſwer to this, it was ſaid by thoſe who ſtood up in defence of the miniſtry, that all Europe, friends as well as enemies, were attentive to, and would found much of their opinion upon the iſſue of the preſent day: that the ſentiments contained in the addreſs would ſerve nearly as much as our military preparations, to intimidate Spain, by convincing them, that whatever differences in opinion, or even tranſient animoſities, might occaſionally ſubſiſt among us, yet we have but one heart and one hand againſt the common enemy: that an addreſs was a compliment to the throne, and not the approbation of a miniſter; and that if a miniſter had acted amiſs, there were other methods of enquiry and cenſure well known, and which would involve no other character; but that the preſent objections were meant as an invidious attack on the crown: that nothing could be more abſurd than the idea, that any private differences, diſcontents, or political ſquabbles among ourſelves, could operate in ſuch a manner upon the minds of the people, as to prevent their defending their own rights and intereſts, as well as the dignity of the crown, againſt any confederacy of our enemies: that no man would ſit ſtill, while his eſtate was ravaged, or his houſe burned, through his diſlike to the manner in which public affairs were conducted: that therefore, if any domeſtic quarrels ſtill exiſted, it would be time enough to adjuſt them when the common danger was removed: that the charge of alienating the colonies is ſo far from being well founded, that the reverſe is the fact; and, except a part of one inconſiderable province, they have been brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, by a ſpirit and prudence which do equal honour to adminiſtration. The charge of not arming ſooner, and of making it a crime that ſome of our Weſt-India iſlands were liable to danger, would, upon examination, it was ſaid, appear equally groundleſs: that the truth was, the nation could not have been armed ſooner; our fleets cannot be fitted out, except when our trade is at home, or juſt coming home, as ſailors are not to be had at any other time; and that it is well known, that the trade was not at home, nor near coming home, in the preſent inſtance. As the miniſtry, therefore, could not arm effectually, it was an act of the greateſt prudence not to excite a general alarm by attempting it, which would have been a ſignal to our enemies to have done the ſame, as they are not under the ſame diſadvantages, to have effected that, which we could only have attempted; whereas now we are upon an equal footing, if not before them.

As to the other charge, it is only to aſk, Whether there can be a poſſibility of undertaking to ſecure every part of the Britiſh dominions, in their whole extent, from every ſudden blow that might be given in caſe of a war; and if there is, what given number of troops would be required to anſwer ſuch an undertaking? It was ſaid, that our character for courage was too well, and too generally eſtabliſhed, to leave any room for our being concerned about it; and as war was never deſireable while peace could be preſerved with ſecurity and honour, therefore it was right to leave an opening, whereby the king of Spain might, if he choſe it, withdraw himſelf with honour, and, by diſavowing the act of his ſervant, avoid the alternative of a war, or of making diſagreeable conceſſions, and of acknowledging himſelf the author of a raſh and haſty meaſure.

The addreſs being carried and preſented, the duke of Richmond in the houſe of lords, and Mr. Dowdeſwell in that of the commons, both made motions, that all the papers which had been ſent to the miniſtry ſhould be produced, but this the miniſtry would by no means comply with. In defence of their conduct, they ſaid, that we were now engaged in a negotiation of the utmoſt importance with the kingdom of Spain, by which it was expected that matters would be brought to an accommodation; that the honour and happineſs of two great nations were now at ſtake, and that if the papers were produced, it would, in a great meaſure, contribute towards making all Europe acquainted with ſecrets which ought to be concealed till the event they related to had taken place.

That if it had been prudent on our own account to unlock the Engliſh cabinet to all Europe, yet it would have been very wrong to betray the ſecrets of the king of Spain; that they were now treating with us, and a rude publication of what was delivered in ſecrecy, muſt at once put and end to all amicable intercourſe; that the king of Spain had openly diſavowed of the conduct of his ſervant, and promiſed the moſt equitable ſatisfaction; that by acting with temper and prudence we might avoid the horrors of a long, bloody and expenſive war; that adminiſtration had not been negligent on this occaſion, for the ſame day the intelligence arrived, a meſſenger was diſpatched to our ambaſſador at Madrid to demand ſatisfaction; that diſputes had now ariſen between the two kingdoms, on account of the ignorance or inſolence of officers, while there was no intention of a quarrel between their reſpective governments; for in ſome inſtances our officers had not been always guarded in their conduct.

That therefore in the preſent inſtance, as well with regard to the honour as the intereſt of the nation, it was neceſſary to demand ſatisfaction; firſt, in a peaceable manner, for nothing was more reaſonable than to enquire whether we had a warrantable right to reſent before we commenced hoſtilities; otherwiſe it would be ſaid that we courted war. Secondly, if the Spaniards were not to be urged into juſtice by reaſon, then they muſt be compelled; and adminiſtration, though willing, if poſſible, to avoid the calamities of war, had prepared, at all events, for the worſt; ſo that the preparations for the war went hand in hand with the negotiation for peace. In behalf of the motion it was urged, that parliament can never have too ample a field for information; that the members are all counſellors of the crown; and to enable them to give proper council, it was neceſſary that every intelligence, with reſpect to what they were to give their advice upon, ſhould be laid before them; that they were now met to conſider the buſineſs of the kingdom, in a time of public danger; and that they had been told from the throne, that they would be applied for to advice, and although they were not, yet it was their duty to give it; that their advice and interference was now particularly neceſſary, when by an unparalleled ſucceſſion of weak and ſhameful meaſures, the nation was diſgraced, inſulted, and diſhonoured abroad and at home, weak, divided, and expoſed to every danger; that the pretence to negotiation was an indignity to the crown, and a diſhonour to the nation; that we had been forcibly robbed by a foreign power, and till what had been in this manner unjuſtly taken was returned, it was inconſiſtent with our honour to negotiate; that in fact, there is no ground or matter to negotiate upon; the Spaniards have driven our people from one of our ſettlements, and taken poſſeſſion of it, although they had no right to do ſo, and yet our miniſters enter into a treaty with them; that the very terms of the motions obviate all the objections that have been made to it, and which are only founded on the pretended ill conſequences that would attend the expoſing the papers, while this negotiation is going on.

Such were the principal points upon which this debate was carried on; but the queſtion being put, the motion was rejected by a great majority. Many people blamed the miniſtry for their conduct in this affair; for they thought, that as parliament alone could grant the neceſſary ſupplies, ſo they ought to have had the peruſal of all the papers relating to the controverſy; and it is an eſtabliſhed principal, that the man who acts from motives of integrity, need never be either afraid or aſhamed to have his conduct enquired into.

The next motion, which was looked upon conſiſtent with the fundamental principles of our conſtitution, was made in the houſe of lords, to enquire into the legality of the the Middleſex election; and the debates on that important ſubject were carried on in the moſt learned and eloquent manner. In particular lord Camden ſpoke in the moſt forcible manner, in defence of the rights of the people; but the motion was rejected. As ſome proſecutions had been carried on by the attorney-general againſt ſeveral bookſellers and printers, a motion was made to enquire into the legal power of that law officer, and a long debate enſued. The principal queſtion to be diſcuſſed was, whether juries are judges of the law as well as the fact, or whether they are judges of the fact only. That juries are judges of the law as well as the fact; the following caſe was put by thoſe who ſupported the motion. A ſon kills his father, and the matter of fact, which is of the blackeſt colour, is proved. The jury, however, examine into the circumſtances, and find that it was an accidental misfortune, in which the intention had no ſhare, and judging from thence, acquit the criminal, even from the imputation of a crime. If then they have this right, to examine into and ſeparate the guilt and the intention, and to judge of both, upon what principle of law can they be deprived of it, in other criminal caſes of leſs nature, ſuch as libels, ſcandals, or any ſuch thing.

That with reſpect to the power of juries we have, in all our general hiſtories, a moſt remarkable precedent, namely, the caſe of the ſeven biſhops. There the jury could have acquitted them upon another principle than that of their right to judge of the intention. An order had been ſent to the biſhops to cauſe the king's (James II.) declaration for liberty of conſcience, to be read in all their churches, and theſe ſeven not only refuſed to do it, as contrary to law, but at the ſame time preſented a petition againſt it, which being deemed a libel, they were all committed to the Tower. Having moved the court of King's-bench for a writ of Habeas Corpus to be diſcharged, the attorney-general filed an information, and their trial come on in Weſtminſter-hall. The information was for writing a libel, which they denied, though at the ſame time they acknowledged writing the paper in queſtion. The judges ſaid all they could to influence the minds of the jurors; but they, like honeſt men, judging from the intention, found that the paper was no libel, and therefore acquitted the biſhops, to the general ſatisfaction of all ranks of men in the nation. Some ſevere ſtrictures were thrown againſt a great judge, who had aſſerted from the bench, that juries were judges of the facts only; and that upon a trial for murder, the jury had been ſent back after they had brought in their verdict guilty, and were peremptorily ordered to find it only manſlaughter. It was further urged, that ſuch proceedings had excited an univerſal contempt among all ranks of people of our courts of law; for if juries were to be threatened and intimidated in this manner, our moſt valuable privileges would become an empty name, and we ſhould have no more than the ſhadow, when the ſubſtance was gone. That in ſuch caſes, juries would become ſtanding councils to an arbitrary adminiſtration, and, under pretence of being the guardians of our liberties, would give a ſanction to the will of every judge who acted under the influence of the miniſtry; and who, on every occaſion, took his inſtructions from them.

In anſwer to this it was ſaid, that nothing in human life ſhould be conſidered in a more ſacred light, than the character of a judge. That in the preſent inſtance, a diſhonour would be brought upon the nation; becauſe, by implication, it would ſuppoſe that thoſe perſons who are the ſacred keepers of our laws, had all been corrupted. That no ſpecific charge had been made, for the motion was ſo vague and uncertain, and might have been extended to any man or body of men whatever in the kingdom. It is true, the condemnation of one or two perſons was chiefly aimed at; but by an eaſy implication, all thoſe in office might be included, and the guilt transferred from one to the other. But the principal part of the reply, conſiſted in admitting and defending the accuſation. They ſaid, they would firſt admit the charge to be true, that one of the judges had declared from the bench, that the jurors were judges of facts only, and not of law, nor ought they to judge thereof.

They ſaid, that admitting all this, there was nothing at all new in the caſe; for it was what had ever been maintained by the judges in all ages. They did not deſire to go back to the deciſions of Scroggs, Jefferies, Pemberton, or Wright, becauſe they lived in violent times; but produced the authority of one of the greateſt lawyers that ever England produced, namely, the late lord Raymond. The caſe of Frankland for publiſhing the Craftſman was read by one of the members, from the ninth volume of the ſtate-trials; and it was the ſame with that complained of. Frankland had publiſhed the Craftſman, in which were many ſevere ſtrictures againſt thoſe in power, and this was conſidered as a libel. The publiſher was apprehended, and being held to bail; the trial came on before lord Raymond, then chief-juſtice of the King's bench. His lordſhip told the jury, that the queſtion before them was, whether Frankland publiſhed the Craftſman, that they were judges of facts only, and not of law, unleſs they would take upon them to declare what law was, and abide by their own explanation. This was the very thing complained of, and it had at all times been an eſtabliſhed maxim in the law of England. Since Magna Charta, no author had ever aſſerted, no judge had ever declared, nor had it been ſo much as ever imagined by any perſons that juries could judge of the law. In proof of the above many caſes were quoted, all tending to prove, that the fact and nothing more comes under the cognizance of the jury. But the principal ſtreſs of the argument was reſted on the want of ſpecification in the motion, with which the charges made in the debate had no relation. The general implication of guilt that would attend ſuch an enquiry, when there was no reaſon to believe that the ſmalleſt cenſure had been incurred; and the injuſtice as well as the imprudence of raiſing general clamour againſt all the judges, when it appeared from the motion, that even the malevolent breath of ſuſpicion falls only on two.

In reply to theſe arguments, it was maintained that the gentleman who made the motion, as well as thoſe who ſupported it, acted upon more liberal and enlarged principles than to turn informers, ſo that there was no reaſon to brand them with a mean perſonality. They went on a larger field; for the cauſes of complaint were too numerous, and the enormities too great to be reached or implied by a ſpecific charge; that no injury would be done, no character deſtroyed, no particular perſon ruined, unleſs it appeared by the reſult, that his conduct had merited puniſhment. That the cauſes which had already been ſhewn within doors, were ſufficient motives for the enquiry, and that the general diſcontents without, and the public cenſure of the court, which, both in words and in writing had ſpread throughout the nation, made it abſolutely neceſſary; that if any thing further need be urged in favour of it, the characters and weight of thoſe reſpectable names which now required it, whether conſidered as members of that houſe, or of the community in general, ſhould, in itſelf, be a cauſe every way ſufficient to juſtify the motion.

That though the enquiry had been propoſed upon that liberal and enlarged plan, ſeveral ſpecific charges had been made; for the characters of the judges, and the great reverence due to our courts of juſtice, demanded it; that if the cenſure and obloquy thrown upon them ſhould appear to be ill founded, nothing could ſo effectually put a ſtop to it, or redound ſo much to their honour: that all thoſe who were real friends to the judges, and who believed them innocent, ſhould promote the enquiry; if they were guilty, who would avow a wiſh to ſcreen them from puniſhment?

That, in the former caſe, no miſchief or danger can be apprehended to them; if their doctrines are conſtitutional, every imputation will fly off, and they will meet with the greateſt applauſe; if they are legal, though not conſtitutional, it will procure neither cenſure nor condemnation to them, and a remedy can be ſought for the diſeaſe, by making the laws and the conſtitution agree.

It was further inſiſted, that they had heard, from the mouth of one of their own members, that attempts had been made to corrupt the venerable ſages of the law; and that a late judge, (Sir Joſeph Yates) equally celebrated for his knowledge and integrity, had been tampered with by adminiſtration, and ſollicited to favour the crown in certain trials which were then depending between it and the ſubject: that though this, as a death-bed declaration, could not be eſtabliſhed in ſuch a manner as to amount to a legal proof, yet the ſurmiſe of the poſſibility of ſuch an attempt was a matter of a moſt alarming nature, which called upon all their care and attention, and demanded the moſt ſtrict inquiſition into the conduct of the courts.

It was further urged, that the ſtate trials was not one of our law-books, and therefore no precedent quoted from it could be of any authority in the preſent caſe: but ſuppoſing it to be admitted only for one moment, what conſequence is to follow, or what inference to be drawn? It is the opinion of a ſingle judge, and here it is drawn into a precedent: the hiſtory of our law is full of the different opinions of different great lawyers; and, unfortunately, few caſes could be put, which may not be ſupported by the ſanction of ſome time ſerving precedent. The only juſt inference is, that our laws, particularly thoſe which were the ſubject of the preſent debate, ſtand as much in need of reviſion as our courts of juſtice; and it is, in the higheſt degree, neceſſary to both: that this reviſion is the more urgent, as, from the doctrines laid down of late, the office of a juryman appears to be ſo involved in intricacies, ſo immerſed and enveloped in law, that no two of the greateſt ſages, who have made the laws the ſtudy of their lives, can agree in their definition of it. Let this rubbiſh, then, be removed, and the line drawn with ſuch preciſion, that this controverted doctrine may be eſtabliſhed on clear, determined principles, ſo that any ſenſible juryman, without being a lawyer, may know his own rights and privileges; and a judge, without daring to encroach on thoſe privileges, may reſt ſatisfied with his own legal authority.

Such were ſome of the principal arguments made uſe of by both parties; and the candid, unprejudiced reader will ſee, that paſſion, prejudice, and truth, were all jumbled together, without that coolneſs of temper which, on many occaſions, has eſtabliſhed a bad cauſe.

The houſe divided upon this important queſtion; but when the votes came to be taken, it was rejected by a very great majority. But although the motion was rejected, a noble lord, whoſe conduct had been ſeverely cenſured, could not reſt eaſy under the aſperſions which had been thrown out againſt him by the moſt reſpectable members of ſo awful an aſſembly, eſpecially as ſome of them were lawyers who had made the moſt diſtinguiſhing figure at the bar. This nobleman had lately delivered a charge to a jury, which the popular party complained much of, becauſe it contained ſentiments coinciding with the charges already mentioned. His lordſhip, therefore, left a paper with the clerk, containing his opinion; and deſired that it might be read in the hearing of all the peers then preſent, they having been ſummoned for that purpoſe. Each of the members were permitted to take a copy of this paper; and then a queſtion was propoſed, whether it was meant that the paper ſhould be entered on the journals? which was anſwered in the negative. A violent debate then aroſe concerning the ſubject matter of the paper, which was managed in the following manner.

Lord Camden took notice, that he had gone through every department of the law, and therefore he conſidered himſelf as able to judge of ſuch matters, excluſive of his title of peerage. He offered to maintain, that the doctrine laid down as the judgment of the court, was not the law of England; declared, that he was ready at any time to enter into the debate, and preſſed his antagoniſt to appoint an early day for that purpoſe. He propoſed ſeveral queſtions from the ſubject matter of the paper, evidently tending to bring it before the houſe, but all to no purpoſe, for his motion was over-ruled, and nothing farther was done in an affair of the utmoſt importance to the community. This occaſioned much cenſure from the moſt ſenſible part of the people in general, becauſe, had the lords decided what was law on this motion, it would have ſaved many diſputes and litigations which may hereafter ariſe. By ſuch a deciſion, we ſhould have known what power our law has given to juries, and how far they are judges either of the law itſelf, or of ſuch collateral evidence as ariſes out of the given fact.

It was next moved by one of the noble peers, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, humbly praying, that he would give orders to haſten our preparations, and to put our Weſt-India ſettlements in a proper ſtate of defence: that as we had the utmoſt reaſon to fear that the Spaniards would attack Gibraltar, therefore the garriſon of that important fortreſs ought to be reinforced, and every method made uſe of for its ſecurity. While he was delivering his ſentiments on this important ſubject, he was ſuddenly interrupted by a motion made to clear the houſe of all ſuch as had not a right to ſit there.

It was ſaid, that when motions were brought in by ſurprize, and there was no previous notice given of what they might conſiſt, and ſuch things came out upon them which ought not to be divulged to any beſides the noble perſons concerned in them: that notes had been taken of what paſſed in the houſe; and that the enemy might have emiſſaries there, who would hear the weakneſs and nakedneſs of the nation expoſed: that it was through indulgence only, that any beſides peers were admitted, and the ſtanding order for that purpoſe was called for and read.

On the other ſide, it was admitted, that any lord had a right to clear the houſe when he pleaſed; but that doing it upon this particular occaſion would alarm the people; that they would imagine either public affairs to be in a worſe ſituation than they were acquainted with, or that their proceedings were of ſuch a nature, that they were afraid of making them public: that as the nobleman who had been ſpeaking had not been charged with any act of diſorder or impropriety, it was both inſidious and irregular, under pretence of clearing the houſe, to interrupt him in the midſt of a moſt excellent ſpeech, which he was making on a ſubject of the utmoſt importance. Inſtead of an anſwer to theſe arguments, the houſe became one ſcene of confuſion, nothing being heard but "Clear the houſe." A noble earl attempted ſeveral times to ſpeak; but as none preſent would hear him, he called out, that if he was not allowed the privilege of a lord of parliament, he would retire from the houſe, which he accordingly did, and was followed by eighteen peers in a body; a circumſtance which had ſcarce ever been known before.

Upon the departure of theſe lords, all the members of the houſe of commons who happened to be then preſent were ordered to withdraw, and then the confuſion became general. Some of the commons called out, that they were come there, by order of their own houſe, to preſent ſome bills, upon which they were called to the bar; but no ſooner had they delivered them, than they were ordered out of the houſe.

The ſeceding lords had gone into the houſe of commons, to hear the debates on a bill for the augmentation of the royal regiment of artillery; but no ſooner had the members, who had been forced out of the houſe of peers, returned, and given an account in what manner they had been treated, than the order of the houſe was read, and the peers were obliged to depart.

In the mean time, Mr. Harris, our ambaſſador at Madrid, was negotiating with the Spaniſh miniſtry, and expreſſes were daily paſſing between the courts of Great-Britain and Spain. It was obſerved, that the whole conduct of the Spaniſh miniſtry on this occaſion was one continued act of duplicity and deſign; and whatever the cauſes were which operated to the prevention of a war, it does not appear that they are to be ſought for in the pacific or friendly diſpoſitions of the court of Madrid. The public opinion, which ſeems to have been well founded, attributed the convention to the mediation of France; and, it is probable, that the ſame internal cauſes which moved her to act as a mediator, were thoſe which prevented her from taking an active part as an ally. It was thought that the power of the duke de Choiſeul, who hurried on the war both at home and in Spain, began, at that time, to totter. Other councils prevailed; and that great miniſter was ſoon after ſtripped of all his employments, and obliged to retire to his country ſeat.

But whatever were the ſecret motives which induced the court of France to act in this manner, certain it is, that their preparations for war kept pace, for ſome time, with thoſe in Spain. It would appear, that, the Chriſtmas holidays coming on, there muſt have been ſome hopes of an accommodation taking place, eſpecially as both houſes of parliament adjourned to a later day than uſual.

During the receſs of parliament, Sir Edward Hawke reſigned the place of firſt lord of the admiralty, and was ſucceeded in that important office by the earl of Sandwich. About the ſame time, ſome of thoſe gentlemen who had been particularly attached to the late Mr. Grenville, and had, both as to acts and declarations, been among the moſt violent of thoſe in oppoſition, now came over to the ſide of adminiſtration; and the earl of Suffolk was appointed keeper of the privy-ſeal, in the room of the earl of Halifax, who ſucceeded the earl of Sandwich as ſecretary of ſtate for the northern department. Several other changes took place; Mr. Juſtice Bathurſt received the great ſeal as high chancellor of Great-Britain, and was created a peer of England under the title of lord Apſley: Mr. De Grey, at that time attorney-general, was made chief juſtice of the common pleas, in room of Sir John E. Wilmot, who reſigned: Mr. Thurlow was advanced to be attorney-general, and Mr. Wedderburne ſucceeded him as ſollicitor, being, at the ſame time, appointed cofferer to the queen. Such other changes as took place were all ſubordinate to theſe, and ſo connected with them, that it is needleſs to mention them in this place.

A. D. 1771. On the twenty-ſecond of January, the parliament met, after a month's receſs; and the ſame day prince Maſerano, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ſigned the declaration, with the earl of Rochford, ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department. By this declaration, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, in the name of the king his maſter, diſavows the violences offered at Port Egmont; and ſtipulated, that every thing ſhould be reſtored there, in the ſame manner in which they were before the reduction took place. But, at the ſame time, he declared, that this reſtoration is not in any wiſe to affect the queſtion, of the prior right of the ſovereignty of theſe iſlands; and, by the acceptance, the performance of theſe ſtipulations is to be conſidered as a ſatisfaction for the injury done to the court of Great-Britain.

This tranſaction was immediately announced to both houſes of parliament, and copies thereof were laid before them. It was then moved, that all the papers relating to the convention ſhould be laid before the houſe, which was complied with, except in one inſtance, namely, that of keeping back ſuch papers as contained the Spaniſh claims to Falklands Iſlands. This occaſioned a warm debate, but the miniſtry ſcreened themſelves under pretence that all the offices had been ſearched, but no more papers could be found. It was, at the ſame time, charged upon the miniſtry, that the interference of France was a diſhonour to Great-Britain; but the miniſtry denied the charge, by aſſerting, that France had never been employed to act as a mediator; but they would neither acknowledge or deny that ſhe had acted in that character. It was then propoſed to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for ordering the papers to be laid before them, but this was objected to by the minority, who denied that all the papers had been laid before them. Warm debates enſued in both houſes; but the miniſterial party prevailed, and the addreſs was preſented without any amendment whatever.

The number of affairs that came before this ſeſſions of parliament were of ſo important a nature that hiſtory would be deficient unleſs they were traſmitted to poſterity.

A moſt remarkable ſcene of corruption was, about this time, brought to light, by the committee appointed to determine conteſted elections; and, in particular, that of New Shoreham in Suſſex. The matter of conteſt was, that the returning officer for that borough had returned a candidate with only thirty-ſeven votes, in preference to one who had eighty-ſeven, of which he doubted ſeventy-ſix, and ſo made his return without examining, as he ought to have done, whether they were legal voters or not.

In the courſe of the examination of witneſſes it appeared, that a great number of the freemen had formed themſelves into a ſociety, which they called the Chriſtian Club; the apparent ends of which inſtitution were to promote acts of charity and benevolence, and to anſwer all ſuch purpoſes as were in any ways conſiſtent with the doctrines of our holy religion. But notwithſtanding all theſe pretenſions, they profaned the ſacred name they had aſſumed, by carrying on the worſt of purpoſes, and making a traffic of their oaths and conſciences, and ſetting their borough to ſale to the higheſt bidder; while the reſt of the freemen were deprived of the privilege of giving their legal votes. The members of this infamous ſociety, compoſed of the dregs of methodiſm, were bound to ſecrecy to each other by the moſt ſolemn oaths, and they had actually entered into written agreements never to divulge their ſecrets. A ſelect committee was choſen from among the others, who were to manage, in private, all their black tranſactions; and, leſt they ſhould be detected in the act of perjury, they refuſed to vote at any election, under the ſtale pretence of ſcruple of conſcience. But having received the wages of iniquity for their borough, they gave directions to the reſt of the freemen who belonged to their ſociety, in what manner to act. Thus by an act of the groſſeſt equivocation, they attempted to impoſe both on God and man, and no ſooner was the election over, than they ſhared the money among them, without any further ſcruple of conſcience.

The returning officer had belonged to this ſociety, but having taken ſome diſguſt at his companions in iniquity, he had, in conſequence thereof, left their party. Being called before the committee he declared, that his reaſon for making ſuch an unequal return was, that he knew, from his own own experience, that the majority of votes had taken bribes: nay, that they had even agreed to ſell their borough to any one who would bid moſt for it. Upon theſe grounds, altho' they had boldly taken the oaths againſt bribery and corruption, yet he looked upon them as totally unqualified; and having taken the opinion of council, which, it ſeems, coincided with his own, he returned the candidate who had the ſmaller number of voters, as they were free from theſe objections. Upon theſe principles, and his not acting intentially wrong, the returning officer veſted his plea of juſtification, for the illegality of his conduct. As the aſſumption of ſuch an act of power by a returning officer, upon whatever principle it was founded, would, however, have been a precedent of the moſt dangerous tendency, he was accordingly taken into cuſtody; but in conſideration of the circumſtances in his favour, and of his bringing ſo infamous a tranſaction to light, he was diſcharged, after receiving a reprimand on his knees from the ſpeaker at the bar of the houſe.

As this combination at Shoreham was of too flagrant a nature to be overlooked, and the ſelect committee not having powers to proceed any further, they reported the whole matter to the houſe, and moved that they would make a further enquiry into it. All thoſe who wiſhed well to the conſtitution, were glad of this opportunity of diſplaying their eloquence, and an act paſſed, by which eighty-one freemen of the borough of Shoreham, were rendered incapable of voting at any election, and the attorney-general was ordered to proſecute all the members of the Chriſtian Club.

The next thing that came before parliament, was of a very important nature to the ſubjects in general, namely, the manner in which the crown lands could be given away by the ſovereign to any of his ſubjects; and how ſoon he could again ſeize on them, or whether he could ſeize them at all.

To underſtand this matter right, the reader muſt conſider that in former times, under the feudal law, our kings had lands aſſigned them for their ſupport, inſtead of money; part of which they often beſtowed upon their favourites, reſerving only a quit-rent as an acknowledgment of ſubjection. By theſe means the kings of this realm acquired the moſt ſolid power, while, at the ſame time, they exhauſted the ſources from whence their ſupport naturally flowed. But as many diſputes had ariſen concerning the right of poſſeſſion in thoſe to whom the crown-lands had been granted; an act paſſed in the reign of James I. that every perſon to whom the king ſhould diſpoſe away any of the crown-lands, ſhould, after ſixty-one years poſſeſſion of them, by himſelf and his heirs, enjoy them without moleſtation for ever, in the ſame manner as if they were freehold.

This was a fine engine in the hands of princes who wanted to govern by parties, and thus we find, that at the reſtoration of Charles II. when that prince, by a ſolemn act, gave up all claim to wardſhips and reliefs, the commons granted him a large ſum of money for his annual ſubſiſtence. The extravagance of Charles, in conſequence of his attachment to pleaſure, induced him to give away many of the crown-lands; and his example was followed by king William after the revolution.

Mr. Bentinck, the great favourite of king William, had been naturalized, and the king made him a grant of ſome lands in Cumberland, which gave great offence to ſome of the Engliſh nobility. Accordingly, a bill was brought in during the reign of queen Anne, and paſſed into a law, ordaining, that for the future, no grants ſhould be made of crown-lands, without reſerving one fourth of the rent to the crown. Nothing, however, material happened in conſequence of this act till the year 1768, when the duke of Grafton, then at the head of the treaſury, made a grant of the duke of Portland's eſtates in Cumberland to Sir James Lowther, without conforming to the act of queen Anne, by reſerving one fourth to the crown.

This was a moſt alarming circumſtance, becauſe many of the principal eſtates of our nobility and gentry were held by grants of crown-lands; and that if Sir James Lowther's claim ſhould be ſuſtained, no perſon could look upon himſelf in peaceable poſſeſſion of any thing that had originally belonged to the crown. It was the general opinion at that time, that this grant had been made to ſerve ſome election purpoſes; but theſe being now over, it was ſuppoſed the matter would drop of courſe. In this, however, they were diſappointed; for an expenſive law-ſuit was commenced, the whole county of Cumberland was in an uproar, four hundred ejectments were ſerved in one day. A motion was then made for bringing in a bill to quiet the ſubjects in the peaceable poſſeſſion of their eſtates; and that it ſhould extend to the proprietors of land throughout every part of the kingdom, according to the ſtatutes already made.

This is what is called the Nullum Tempus bill, and at firſt it paſſed through the houſe by a conſiderable majority; on the ſecond reading it likewiſe paſſed, though with a ſmall majority; but when it came to the third reading, it was rejected by a majority of nine votes, the whole miniſterial influence having been thrown in to defeat it. This conduct of the miniſtry was much cenſured by the people in general, eſpecially as it was a matter of diſpute concerning private property, with which they had no buſineſs to interfere.

It was inſinuated and even declared in public that the miniſtry had written circular letters to all the members who had the leaſt dependence on the court, commanding them to oppoſe the bill, under the penalty of loſing their places; and thus by the rejection of an act of a moſt equitable nature, the miniſtry have it all times in their power to make thoſe who hold lands of the crown, ſubſervient to their deſigns, and to oblige them to vote according to their directions, although contrary to the dictates of reaſon and conſcience.

The laſt thing done by this parliament during the preſent ſeſſions was, the paſſing an act to keep up an armed force in the Eaſt-Indies, and ſome reſtrictions were put upon the company, in order to keep them more dependent on our government. At laſt, after tranſacting a great variety of buſineſs, of the moſt important nature, his majeſty went to the houſe and put an end to the ſeſſions on the eighth of May. In the ſpeech from the throne it was obſerved, that the pacific diſpoſition of the kings of France and Spain furniſhed an opportunity for diſbanding ſome of the forces both by ſea and land. The commons were thanked for the generous manner in which they had granted the ſupplies; and that was conſidered as the ſtrongeſt mark of their attachment to his majeſty's perſon, family and government. The ſpeech concluded, by recommending to their ſerious attention, the ſuppreſſion of all riots and tumults which were become ſo frequent in moſt parts of the kingdom.

Having attended to the parliamentary affairs of Britain, we muſt now look back to the continent of Europe, where the war on the Danube ſeemed to languiſh in the beginning of the campaign. The great victories obtained by the Ruſſians were not without much bloodſhed on their ſide, and the loſs of men by ſickneſs, and all the other caſualties that conſtantly attend the carrying on a war in a diſtant country were prodigious. The neighbouring provinces were ruined, ſo as to reſemble a deſert, and that no ſubſiſtance could be procured, but at an enormous expence. Money was borrowed in other countries for the uſe of the Ruſſians, at the moſt exorbitant intereſt, and in ſome parts the merchants refuſed to advance any; ſo that it is impoſſible to deſcribe the hardſhips the Ruſſian army ſuffered. In March a moſt bloody battle was fought between them and the Turks, on the Walachian ſide of the Danube; and general Weiſman, having obtained a victory, croſſed the river, where the enemy had ſome ſmall parties; but the general drove them from their poſts and deſtroyed their magazines.

The two grand objects the Ruſſians had in view at the opening of this campaign were, the ſecuring ſuch conqueſts as they had made on the Danube, and at the ſame time to penetrate with one of their armies into Crim Tartary.

Crim Tartary, ſo famous among the ancient Greeks by the name of Taurica Cherſoneſus, is a peninſula ſurrounded on all ſides by the Euxine or Black Sea, except where it joins little Tartary, by a ſmall iſthmus not above ſix miles broad. In this iſthmus ſtood the ancient city of Precop; but the Turks have changed the names of thoſe once celebrated places, which were formerly the ſeats of learning and arts. The whole peninſula is one of the moſt fertile ſpots in the world, abounding with many towns and cities; and the entrance, near where Precop ſtood, is fortified by ſtrong lines, with a trench forty-two feet deep, ſeventy-two broad, and from the bottom of the ditch to the creſt of the parrapat, was ſeventy feet. Strong towers had been erected at proper diſtances from each other, and ſtrong cannon were placed upon them.

Prince Dolgorucki was the Ruſſian general appointed to attack this place, and when he arrived before the lines, he found it defended by the chan Selim Guery in perſon, with an army of fifty thouſand Tartars, and ſeven thouſand Turks. But notwithſtanding the difference of numbers, the prince attacked the place on the twenty-fifth of June, two days after their arrival. The Tartar prince behaved with great bravery; for finding it impoſſible to rally his right wing, he went and charged bravely at the head of his left. All his efforts, however, were in vain; for in four hours his whole army was routed, and the lines forced in every place. The Turkiſh garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war the next day; and their whole army, cannon, ammunition, and baggage, fell into the hands of the conquerors. From this circumſtance the reader will ſee, that no fortifications, however ſtrong, nor troops, however courageous, can hold out againſt cool, ſteady, regular diſcipline, which, although it may ſometimes be ſlow, yet in the end it bears down all oppoſition.

The Ruſſians, having made themſelves maſters of this important paſs, over-run the whole of the peninſula; the Turkiſh garriſon deſerted Koſtoff, and having deſtroyed the fortifications, embarked on board ſome ſhips that lay in the harbour, and ſet ſail for their own country. The governor of Arabat made ſome defence; but the place was taken by ſtorm, and the garriſon put to the ſword. From thence the prince continued his march to Caffa, the capital city of the Crimea, which was immediately ſurrendered to him, and a thouſand men, the remains of the garriſon, were made priſoners of war.

The terror was now ſo great, that the Turks, without waiting for the arrival of the enemy, abandoned the important fortreſſes of Taman, Jenicola, and Kertſch, which commanded the ſtreights between the Black Sea and the town of Azoph, which now fell into the hands of the Ruſſians, without ſtriking a ſingle blow. The Tartars ſubmitted to the conquerors, who took them under their immediate protection; while their unfortunate leader retired to Conſtantinople, where he ſoon after died, not without ſtrong ſuſpicion that he had been put to death in a private manner.

During theſe tranſactions in the Crimea, the Turks, under the command of Mouſſon Oglou, croſſed the Danube in three diviſions, in order to attempt to relieve the fort of Toire, ſituated on the north of that river oppoſite to the antient city of Nicopolis. The Turkiſh army, however, did not ſucceed; but a detachment of them, under the command of a baſſaw, attacked the ſtrong fort of Guirgewo, in which was a Ruſſian garriſon, and in three days the governor agreed to capitulate, upon being allowed to march out with all the honours of war. As this place was very ſtrong, and had coſt the Ruſſians much trouble and loſs before they took it, ſo the conduct of the governor filled the minds of the army with indignation, and prince Repuin ordered all the officers to be put under arreſt.

On the ſeventeenth of Auguſt a detachment of the Turks came up with a body of Ruſſians, and the latter were, after a moſt obſtinate defence, put to flight; but they retreated in the moſt excellent order, taking along with them their wounded men. This was the only field action in which the Turks had hitherto reaped any advantage, and it was magnified at Conſtantinople as if it had been a complete victory.

The Turks had nothing ſo much at heart as that of eſtabliſhing winter quarters in Walachia, and with this view they continued croſſing the Danube in detached parties. But theſe motions could not eſcape the notice of a general ſo vigilant and penetrating as Romanzow, who no ſooner perceived their deſigns, than he made ſuch a number of maſterly diſpoſitions, as not only overthrew their ſchemes, but were conducted with ſuch ability, that every one of them took place at the inſtant of time, and was productive of the effect which was intended.

Inſtead, therefore, of waiting for the enemy, the Ruſſians boldly croſſed the Danube, and attacked them on their own ſide, a circumſtance they had not ſo much as imagined. Two great bodies of Turks, one entrenched at Tulcza, and the other at Maczin, were attacked at the ſame time by the Ruſſian generals Weiſman and Miboradowits, and the event was the ſame in both places. The entrenchments were ſtormed, the Turks totally routed, and the towns taken, in which were large magazines of arms and proviſions.

The night following, general Weiſman marched to attack the grand vizier's camp, which was ſtrongly fortified, at a place called Babadagh; and in it was the flower of the Turkiſh army, covered with a ſtrong train of artillery. Victory, however, was obtained here by the Ruſſians as cheap as before; the Turks were routed with great ſlaughter, the entrenchments and artillery taken, with the caſtle of Babadagh; while the vizier and his ruined army fled thirty miles, to ſeek refuge in mount Hemnus.

A few days after this important event, general Eſſen attacked a large body of Turks, and totally routed them, after having killed two thouſand, and taken four thouſand priſoners, beſides all their baggage, tents, artillery, waggons, ammunition and proviſions. By theſe rapid ſucceſſes, the Turks were driven out of Walachia, while the Ruſſians remained maſters of that province. When the news arrived at Conſtantinople, the people became quite outrageous, and would have proceeded to great extremities, had they not been made to believe, that the loſs was owing to a mutiny which had taken place in the army.

During this year, the Ruſſian fleet in the Mediterranean did not perform any thing remarkable, and the ſevere check given the Greeks had deterred the more ſober from engaging in the war. The fleet was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; and ſome of their ſhips having been ſent to the Italian ports, to purchaſe ſuch things as were wanting, they were refuſed admittance, under pretence that they were infected with the plague. But ſtill, under all theſe diſadvantages, and many others, the Ruſſians, by falling in with a pitiful, cowardly enemy, ſtruck unſpeakable terror in the Levant, and made even the Grand Seignior tremble on his throne. A moſt ſevere blow was given to the trade of the Levant, and throughout all the iſlands of the Archipelago, the coaſts of Greece and Aſia, nothing was to be ſeen but ruin and deſolation: but notwithſtanding, the Ruſſians reaped but very few advantages, and the climate killed many more of their men than thoſe who fell by the ſword.

Whilſt war was thus carried on between thoſe rude and wide-extended empires, and appeared expoſed rather to exterminate than diminiſh the human race, the peſtilence, that other dreadful enemy to mankind, claimed a ſhare of the ſpoil, and ſeemed too impatient to wait for the gleanings of the ſword. When we conſider the havock made by this dreadful diſorder in the Turkiſh army, and that all the provinces near the Black Sea were more or leſs infected with it, it will appear little leſs than a miracle that the Ruſſian army ſhould have eſcaped the fatal contagion. But if their army was ſo fortunate as to eſcape, it was not ſo happy with the interior part of their empire. It firſt diſcovered itſelf in the imperial city of Moſcow; but as it was many hundreds of miles from the theatres of the war, and from the countries countries infected, it could not be reaſonably ſuppoſed that it had been communicated from thence. It raged during the ſummer under the appearance of a malignant fever, but in autumn it aſſumed its true form, and ſwept away many thouſands before it.

The cruel ravages of the diſorder were not, however, more ſhocking to humanity, than the effects it produced on the minds of the barbarous people. The ſeverity of government had been, in ſome meaſure, relaxed, and the moſt horrid licentiouſneſs took place. A wild enthuſiaſt pretended that he had a revelation from heaven, by which he was informed, that a certain image of a ſaint was endowed with efficacy ſufficient to cure thoſe who were infected, and to preſerve thoſe who were not. This drew innumerable crowds of people together, ſo that many thouſands were trampled to death, and the ſick dropped down dead in the midſt of ſuch as were healthy. Thus the contagion was communicated in ſuch a manner, that no attempts could reſtrain its progreſs; while the populace, aſſembling in ſuch numerous bodies, broke out into the moſt violent outrages.

The artful impoſtor, who contrived the fraud, had placed a cheſt before the image of the ſaint, to receive ſuch money as the people gave; but the archbiſhop of Moſcow, who ſeems to have been a prudent man, ordered the cheſt to be ſealed up, and both it and the image of the ſaint removed out of the church. This act, which deſerved the higheſt commendations, had a quite different effect on the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude, for they ran to the archbiſhop's houſe, and utterly demoliſhed it. The good prelate had eſcaped, through a back door, to one of the monaſteries, where he hoped to be protected; but thither the enraged multitude followed him, and dragging the venerable old man into the ſtreets, put him to death in the moſt horrid and barbarous manner.

A body of troops having been ſent to quell the rioters, they refuſed to diſperſe; upon which the ſoldiers fired upon them, and many hundreds of them were killed. Many priſoners were taken, and being brought to their trials, were puniſhed according to the cuſtom of the country. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this tragical affair, was the murder of the good old archbiſhop, for the Ruſſians regard their clergy in a more ſacred manner than any other nation in Europe; but who can ſet bounds to enthuſiaſm, when urged on by the violence of a peſtilential diſtemper?

During the whole of this year, the great kingdom of Poland was deluged with blood, from the one extremity to the other: the confederates became more and more inveterate againſt each other, and yet the fertility of the ſoil furniſhed the means of ſubſiſtence. Indeed, it may be juſtly ſaid, that the Ruſſian ambaſſador was the ſovereign of Poland, for all orders iſſued from him, though they were ſanctified with the name of the king. From this circumſtance we may learn what an unhappy thing it is to be under an ariſtocratical government, where the king is elected by a ſelect company of noblemen, who pay no regard to his power, and, in the mean time, make ſlaves of their own tenants. In ſhort, there cannot be a more perfect form of government than that where all the powers in the ſtate are put upon an equal balance.

In the mean time, the king of Poland, who had been raiſed to the throne from a private ſtation, ſupported himſelf under his misfortunes with the moſt heroic fortitude. Conſcious of the moral rectitude of his own heart, he did not even ſuſpect that his enemies had the leaſt intention to do him any injury; but he was miſtaken, as will appear from the following narrative.

About ten in the evening of the third of November, the king, having been on a viſit to a nobleman in the country, returned to his palace at Warſaw; but, juſt as his coach was turning the end of a ſtreet, it was beſet by ſeveral armed men on horſeback, the chief of whom was Koczinſki, an officer among the confederates. Theſe deſperadoes having fired their piſtols into the coach, dragged out the king, and carried him off between two horſemen. The domeſtics who attended the coach did all they could to reſcue the king, but in vain, for one was killed on the ſpot, and the reſt deſperately wounded.

The Ruſſian ſoldiers ran to arms, and found the coach covered with blood, but could learn no accounts of the king; upon which they ſallied forth, and alarmed the detached parties which were on the roads leading to the capital. The aſſaſſins had been joined by ſome of their accomplices at one of the gates, and, without ſtopping, rode off with the king till they came to the village of Willanow, about ſeven Engliſh miles diſtant from Warſaw. The Ruſſians continued purſuing; upon which Koczinſki, with four others, ſeparated from the reſt of his companions, carrying the king with him. When he had proceeded a few miles, he ſent his four companions to procure intelligence, whether any of the Ruſſian forces were advancing; and no ſooner were they gone, than he fell at the king's feet, imploring his pardon, and, at the ſame time, offering to ſave his life. They then proceeded to a hut about a mile diſtant, from whence the king diſpatched a meſſenger to the Ruſſian general, who ſent proper perſons to attend him, and conduct him home. The king had received two wounds on his head, the one from a ſword, and the other from a ball; and his eſcaping with life may be conſidered as one of the moſt extraordinary incidents we meet with in hiſtory.

The aſſaſſin Koczinſki produced a paper, by which it appeared, that he and his confederates were bound by the moſt ſolemn oaths to deliver the king, dead or alive, to the confederacy at Czenſtochau; but, as he ſaid, his heart failed him, and he was ſeized with remorſe as ſoon as he ſaw the bleeding wounds of his ſovereign. This, however, will hardly be credited by any perſon acquainted with human nature, but his reaſons for giving him up were merely to ſave his own life.

It is evident, that the manner in which the king was carried off was attended with much more difficulty than if they had killed him on the ſpot; but then it muſt be remembered, that no perſons in the world are more bewildered in their minds than thoſe who engage in unlawful ſchemes: they are bold and reſolute in words; but no ſooner have they lifted their hands, than all the dreadful conſequences preſent themſelves to their minds, and they are unable to proceed any farther. Indeed, the whole of this aſſaſſin's conduct ſhews, that the mind of man has an inherent diſpoſition to virtue; and that, however it may be warped and depraved, and think itſelf, while at a diſtance, capable of committing the moſt enormous crimes, yet it will frequently ſhrink back with horror, and recover its original diſpoſition, when it comes to the fatal period.

While Poland remained in this diſtracted ſtate, the empreſs of Ruſſia, the emperor of Germany, and the ever enterprizing king of Pruſſia, were not idle; they reſolved to avail themſelves of ſuch circumſtances, and divide that unhappy kingdom, by each taking a part; but this greatly offended the Germans, who were afraid of having the Ruſſians too near them.

While Greece and Poland were over-run with armies, Germany, eſpecially towards the ſouth and eaſt, was ſuffering all thoſe calamities which ariſe from the ſcarcity of proviſions. This dearth was not artificial, but real; for in Bohemia the ſcarcity was ſo great, that a ſevere famine prevailed, and great numbers of people periſhed for want of food. Theſe diſtreſſes were much heightened by the ſeverity of the winter, for in many places the poor people ſtripped the thatch from off their houſes, in order to feed their cattle with it. Nor was the ſpring more favourable, for the vaſt quantities of ſnow which melted on the mountains, fell down in torrents on the level country, and ſwept away every thing before it; and the great rivers having burſt through their ancient boundaries, ſcenes of confuſion, terror and diſtreſs, were ſpread on every ſide. The calamity continued to increaſe as the ſeaſon advanced; and in ſummer, when the beſt weather is expected, nothing was to be ſeen but continual rains; ſo that the country ſeemed to reſemble the ocean, rather than land for the habitation of men.

The inundations of the Elbe were particularly dreadful; many parts of Lower Saxony, and the march of Brandenburgh, were totally ruined. The town of Hamburgh was truly diſtreſſed: the inundation entered one of the gates, and threatened immediate deſtruction; ſo that every perſon in the place was obliged to aſſiſt, in order to divert its courſe, and prevent its farther progreſs. The great ſuburb towards the Elbe, where the gentry had their houſes and gardens, was ſo covered with water, that only the tops of the trees could be ſeen. The magiſtrates ordered a public faſt to be kept, to implore the divine mercy, and avert the threatened judgments.

At Prague, a riot having happened, in conſequence of the ſcarcity of proviſions, the governor told the people, that unleſs they diſperſed, he would order the troops to fire upon them; to which they anſwered, with great coolneſs and indifference, that they would look upon the execution of his threatenings as a favour, a ſudden death by a ſhot being much preferable to a ſlow one by famine. The governor had humanity and prudence enough to refrain from fulfilling his threats; and having tranſmitted an account of theſe tranſactions to the empreſs-queen, ſhe burſt into tears, and immediately ſent them all the relief that was in her power.

On the twelfth of February this year, the king of Sweden died ſuddenly, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, the preſent king, then at Paris on his travels. The ſenate of Sweden met, and having drawn up the common diploma, by which the prince was inveſted with the regal dignity, expreſſes were diſpatched to him at Paris, to notify the news in form, and deſire his majeſty would return to his own dominions. He did not, however, leave Paris, till he had concluded a treaty with the French king, and then he ſet out, accompanied by his brother. At Berlin he ſpent a few days in cloſe conference with his uncle, the king of Pruſſia; and then continued his journey to Stockholm, where he was received amidſt the acclamations of his ſubjects.

During this year, one of the moſt remarkable revolutions in the internal government of France took place, of any we find mentioned in hiſtory. That faithful, uncorrupted body of men, the parliament of Paris, had long defended the liberties of their fellow ſubjects; but integrity, and every other virtue, are little regarded by lawleſs power. The king having ſent for the members to the palace, ordered them to regiſter ſome iniquitous edicts; but they abſolutely refuſed, and returning to the parliament-houſe, entered into a bond to ſtand by each other in doing juſtice, although the conſequence ſhould be death.

A body of dragoons ſurrounded the parliament-houſe, and forced the clerks to regiſter the edicts; upon which the parliament proteſted againſt it, and deputed their firſt preſident to wait on the king. But all the anſwer they received from the haughty monarch was, that next day they ſhould be all ſent into baniſhment. This accordingly took place, and theſe venerable fathers and guardians of the laws were ſent to different villages at a great diſtance from their friends and families. Such was the fate of this noble and diſintereſted aſſembly, whoſe actions would have done honour to a Roman ſenate. This fall was not more glorious from the cauſe in which it was engaged, than from the circumſtances which attended it; for ſeveral of the other parliaments in the provinces reſigned their offices in honour of that of Paris.

With reſpect to the ſtate of parties in England during the long receſs of parliament, ſeveral changes gradually took place. Moſt of the party known by the name of Grenvilles had gone over to the court, ſo that the miniſtry acquired a conſiderable degree of ſtrength, while many others in the oppoſition relinquiſhed their attachment to any parties whatever. Indeed, in all thoſe parties formed for oppoſing the meaſures of government, we ſtill find them inferior to thoſe attached to the court; but that is not the worſt that ſometimes happens, for diſſentions taking place, will ruin the beſt ſocieties which were ever yet eſtabliſhed. Many gentlemen, however, who ſcorned to mix private reſentment againſt any individual with what concerned the public, remained firm in their principles; but ſeeing every thing carried, by a great majority, in favour of what appeared to them inconſiſtent with the rights of their country, became wearied with fruitleſs attendance, while there was not the leaſt appearance of redreſs.

One event took place during this receſs, which ſurprized the whole nation, and made way for an act, the next ſeſſions, of a moſt extraordinary nature. The event alluded to was no other than the marriage of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady, and daughter to lord Irnham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This ſtep of the duke's gave great offence at court; eſpecially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not concealed in the ſame manner as the marriage of the duke of Glouceſter with the counteſs dowager of Waldegrave.

A. D. 1772. On the twenty-firſt day of January, the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech, expreſſed much ſatisfaction, that neither the foreign nor domeſtic ſtate of affairs required their more early attendance: that, now they were aſſembled, they would, no doubt, attend to the intereſts of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its foreign commerce. They were likewiſe informed, that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on the beſt terms with that court. It was, however, recommended to them, to keep the navy on the moſt reſpectable footing, to be ready in caſe of any neceſſity for the future. The addreſſes were preſented in the uſual form; and then the public buſineſs was opened, by making proper inquiries into the ſtate of the navy; and the miniſtry propoſed, that twenty-five thouſand ſeamen ſhould be voted for the ſervice of the current year. In ſupport of this motion, it was urged by the miniſtry, that the French had ſent a conſiderable fleet to the Eaſt-Indies, and that we were, on that account, obliged to ſupport a more conſiderable naval force there than before: that a large ſquadron was employed in the protection of our Weſt-India iſlands; for ſhould any miſunderſtanding ariſe between us and the Spaniards, thoſe valuable acquiſitions, if not properly taken care of, would fall into the hands of our enemies: that the war between the Ruſſians and Turks made it alſo neceſſary to employ a greater number of ſhips for the protection of our commerce in the Mediterranean and the Archipelago, than had been cuſtomary in times of general peace: that by keeping up a reputable body of ſeamen, we would not be under the cruel neceſſity of granting preſs-warrants in caſe of the breaking out of a new war; and although the expence might be more than is common in times of peace, the advantages would amply repay it.

To theſe arguments it was anſwered by thoſe in oppoſition, that the nation was already groaning under a load of taxes; and, inſtead of doing or propoſing any thing for paying off the national debt, here was a propoſal made to increaſe it in a time of profound peace: that, allowing the exigencies of the times required it, yet it did not appear but that, on every future occaſion, the ſame pretence might be made, whether there was any neceſſity for it or not.

Two of our greateſt naval commanders ſtrongly oppoſed the motion, and condemned the then preſent arrangement of the fleet. They obſerved, that the force already in the Eaſt-Indies was either too great or too little: that if the appearances of a permanent peace, as held out in the ſpeech, were to be relied on, it was too great, and, in caſe of war, it was inſufficient: that the ſame objections lay to the arrangement at Jamaica, where the ſquadron conſiſted only of about four ſhips, and was altogether unable to protect it, ſuppoſing any danger of an attack. Many ſevere ſarcaſms were levelled at the miniſtry for the futility of their conduct, becauſe they accompanied a ſpeech which breathed nothing but ſentiments of peace, with all the actual preparation for war. At laſt, the queſtion having been put, the motion was carried as uſual, and the miniſtry reigned triumphant.

The next buſineſs that came before the houſe was a petition for leave to bring in a bill to excuſe ſome of the clergy from ſubſcribing to the thirty-nine articles of religion. It was urged in favour of the motion, that Chriſt came to make all his followers free: that they could not ſubſcribe to doctrines of human invention, but only to the ſacred ſcriptures; and that it was their right to explain them according to what they eſteemed their genuine ſenſe and meaning. On the other hand, it was urged againſt the motion, that to grant ſuch an indulgence would be to open a door for all ſorts of licentiouſneſs; for, under a pretence that ſuch and ſuch tenets were the pure dictates of conſcience, the fundamental doctrines of our religion would be ſubverted, and blaſphemy taught in our churches: that moſt of thoſe who had aſſociated at the Feathers Tavern upon this ſiniſter buſineſs, had been formerly diſſenters, but had left their original profeſſion, in order to enjoy ſome of the ſpoils of the church, and that they had brought their Arian and Socinian notions along with them: that if their conſciences were ſo very tender, they might throw up their livings, and return to their conventicles, where they would be at liberty to diſſeminate what notions they pleaſed: that, by doing ſo, they would give a convincing proof of their diſintereſtedneſs; but nothing could be more reaſonable, than for a church eſtabliſhed by law to beſtow her honours upon thoſe who ſubſcribed her doctrines, and conformed to her diſcipline. Upon the whole, the motion was rejected by a great majority, and not without ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of thoſe who had promoted it.

But of all the buſineſs tranſacted during this ſeſſions, none was conſidered as of ſuch importance, or made greater noiſe, than that of a meſſage ſent by his majeſty to the houſe of lords. In this meſſage it was obſerved, that his majeſty being deſirous, from paternal affection to his own family, an anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, as a matter of public concern, had always belonged to the princes of this realm. He therefore recommended to both houſes to take it into their ſerious conſideration, whether it may not be wiſe and expedient to ſupply the defects of the laws now in being, and, by ſome new proviſion, more effectually guard the deſcendants of his late majeſty, except ſuch as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, firſt had and obtained.

In conſequence of this meſſage, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, which fully anſwered all the purpoſes intended. This bill was oppoſed, with great ſtrength of argument, by ſome of the moſt reſpectable peers in the nation. All the judges were ſent for to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the immediate branches of the royal family muſt be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches, they could not ſay. At laſt the motion was carried, though not till fourteen lords entered a proteſt againſt it, as being inconſiſtent with the law of nature.

In the houſe of commons, the bill met with a much ſtronger oppoſition; and thoſe in oppoſition boldly declared, that it had been brought in at a time when moſt of the gentlemen of the law, whoſe opinions would have been of great ſervice, were gone on the circuits. But, notwithſtanding all the ſtrength of argument, it paſſed, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent. All that we ſhall ſay concerning this bill ſhall be reduced to a few words. By thoſe who promoted it, it was ſaid, that, abſtracting from all principles of natural right, it was neceſſary that municipal inſtitutions ſhould take place, eſpecially where the public ſafety was concerned: that during the diſtractions between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, ſome branches of the royal family had married in the moſt imprudent manner with the daughters and widows of ſubjects, which was attended with ſuch a train of evils, that the whole nation was deluged in blood: that, properly ſpeaking, no attempt had been made to ſet aſide natural rights, any further than was abſolutely neceſſary to preſerve the public peace, which was much preferable to the ſtate of individuals.

On the other hand, it was urged, that all mankind, in the act of marriage, are, by nature, free: that no marriage can ever be a real, legal one, where the conſent of the parties has not firſt been obtained: that no political laws can ſet aſide natural rights: that if choice alone can conſtitute a real marriage, then nothing can authorize the moſt dignified perſon in the univerſe to lay a reſtraint on any perſon whatever. It was urged further, that ſuch an unlimited power given to the ſovereign, was, in all reſpects, inconſiſtent with the conſtitution, nor was there one precedent in hiſtory to give countenance to it: that, had it been inherent as a principle in our conſtitution, it muſt have long ſince become the ſubject matter of many of our ſtatutes: that, on the contrary, till the preſent time, this prerogative was unheard of in Engliſh juriſprudence: that there was no remedy in law appertaining to ſuch pretended right in the crown, nor any court of law in which a proſecution could be carried on for ſuch pretended offences; and as, therefore, there could be no right without a remedy, it was evident this prerogative could have no real exiſtence: that the act which regulated other marriages, expreſsly excepted the royal family; and it is well known, that the common law, until that period, left all men to their natural liberty. Had it been otherwiſe, had any proviſion been made, or had the paternal authority, exerciſed in Rome, been a part of our conſtitution, ſuch a ſtatute would have been both abſurd and ridiculous, becauſe uſeleſs and unneceſſary. Such were the arguments made uſe of in this debate, and the reader is left to draw from them what concluſions he pleaſes.

The petition to parliament relating to diſpenſation with the ſubſcription to the thirty-nine articles, being diſmiſſed, ſo far as it related to churchmen in general, the diſſenters reſolved to try the ſame method.

It happened that, in the late debate, ſome favourable expreſſions had been made uſe of with reſpect to the diſſenters, in oppoſition to thoſe who treated them with ſcurrility. It was conſidered as a hardſhip that they ſhould be obliged, under pains and penalties, to ſubſcribe the doctrinal articles of the church of England, eſpecially as they received no emolument from the civil power, beſides that of protection. Some of the members in the houſe of commons promiſed to do every thing in their power to promote a bill for their relief, which occaſioned a meeting of ſome of the chiefs among the diſſenters. It is neceſſary to obſerve, that, by the act of toleration of the firſt of William and Mary, the diſſenters, who had ſuffered much during the former reigns, gained a legal right to the exerciſe of divine worſhip in their own manner; but this right was conditional with reſpect to their miniſters, ſchoolmaſters, and private tutors, who were obliged to ſubſcribe the doctrinal parts of the articles, otherwiſe they were ſubject to very ſevere penalties.

As the diſſenters were ſtrongly attached to the doctrinal parts of the articles when the act took place, the ſubſcription was not conſidered as a grievance, it being worſhip and diſcipline alone which conſtituted the great line of deſtination between them. However, ſince that period, a remarkable change has taken place in the ſentiments of thoſe people, and there are but few of them now in England who have not run into violent extremes. Thoſe who conſidered ſubſcription as a hardſhip, have been accuſed of teaching the doctrines of Annus and Socinus; while thoſe who ſtill adhere to the doctrines of Calvin, have carried the notions of that reformer more high than ever he intended.

It is true, that ſome of theſe Calviniſtical divines, joined with thoſe in oppoſite ſentiments, in ſigning a petition to parliament; but, at the ſame time, a number of perſons, among whom were ſome common mechanics who had turned preachers, joined in a counter-petition, praying that the clauſe in the act of toleration, that requires ſubſcription to the articles, ſhould not be be on any conſideration diſpenſed with. The arguments made uſe of on this occaſion were nearly the ſame with thoſe relating to the eſtabliſhed church; but the debate was carried on with greater ſpirit.

Natural and religious liberty were contended for on the one hand, and the rights of the church on the other. Some ſevere ſarcaſms were thrown out on the high-church party, by thoſe who ſupported the bill; and, in a very illiberal manner, they were charged with thoſe blemiſhes that had ſtained the characters of their anceſtors.

On the other hand nothing was loſt; for the high-churchmen retaliated, by charging the diſſenters with all the blood ſhed during the civil wars in the laſt century, and alſo with putting the king to death after they had overturned the government in church and ſtate. To this they added, that inſtead of walking in the rigid road of Calviniſm, like their hypocritical anceſtors, they had pulled off the maſk; ſome were ſuch profeſſed Arians that they had written againſt the divinity of Chriſt; others had denied the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt; but the major part had gone very near to deiſm. Some of them had falſified the text of the New Teſtament, to favour their heretical notions; and others had denied the certainty of puniſhment hereafter. In a word, it was ſaid, that they were an epitome of all the hereſies that ever exiſted, and to grant them the requeſted indulgence, would be to open a door for all ſorts of blaſphemy.

Such, in general, were the outlines of the arguments on this bill in the houſe of commons; and, at laſt it paſſed by a ſmall majority. However, when it came to the houſe of lords, it had a more ſevere trial to undergo; for although the Engliſh nobility are enemies to perſecution, yet there are few among them who would grant that indulgence to diſſenters which is denied to their own clergy. Upon the ſecond reading of it in the houſe of lords, there were no leſs than one hundred and thirty-one peers, including proxies, and only twenty-nine of theſe ſupported the bill; ſo that it was thrown out, and the diſſenters left in the ſame ſtate as before.

The affairs of the Eaſt-India company were now in a very perplexed ſituation, and it had been recommended in the ſpeech from the throne, at the opening of the ſeſſion, that ſome enquiry ſhould be made into them. However, it ſeems pretty evident, that adminiſtration had no ſerious intention of entering deeply into that matter for the preſent; and that the movements during the ſeſſions were only made uſe of to keep it alive, and to make or find ſome colour for bringing about a revolution, or total change in the affairs of that opulent company, which were now intangled in a labyrinth of uncertainty.

On the thirtieth of March, the deputy-chairman of the Eaſt-India company moved the houſe for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the ſervants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to reſtrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the ſervants belonging to the company from carrying on any ſort of trade, and to give the directors of the company a ſovereign power over their own ſervants.

It was urged in ſupport of the motion, that the bad ſtate of affairs in India, was owing to the ſmall power the court of directors had over their ſervants, as they could not puniſh them in any other manner than by diſmiſſing them. That nothing was more inconſiſtent with true policy, than to ſuffer governors of provinces at a great diſtance, to become traders and merchants; and that the court of Bengal was not able to adminiſter juſtice to all the other ſettlements.

In anſwer to this it was ſaid, that it was an unparliamentary thing to propoſe bringing in a bill to redreſs a grievance without producing ſufficient proof that the grievance exiſted. That the houſe ought firſt to enter into an enquiry concerning our preſent ſituation of affairs in India, and the cauſes that led to it; that it was to be feared the enquiry would ſhew, that the evils lay too deep to be remedied by the propoſed bill, that it would be almoſt impoſſible to prevent the company's ſervants from trading either directly or indirectly; and that the ſending out ſome gentlemen learned in the laws as judges, was very inadequate to the purpoſe of adminiſtering juſtice to the people, in ſuch a vaſt extended tract of land; and that the meaſure was premature, becauſe we had not yet determined by what code of laws the people were to be governed.

The motion, however, was carried, and this led to an enquiry into the ſtate of affairs in India. All the papers belonging to the company, were ordered to be laid before a ſelect committee of the houſe, and from the peruſal of them, many important diſcoveries were made. Indeed, it was found that the mode of government in India was in every reſpect arbitrary, unconſtitutional, and no way fit for preſerving the rights of the people, nor adminiſtering juſtice to individuals. This committee, finding the buſineſs encreaſing faſt, and the ſeaſon far advanced, deſired leave to continue ſitting during the receſs of parliament, or, at leaſt, till ſuch time as they could go through with the intended enquiry.

In the mean time, the ill temper which had ſo unaccountably taken place between the two houſes during the preceding ſeſſion, ſtill continued during the preſent; and, except in tranſmitting of bills from the one to the other, there was no more communication between them, than if they had been the jealous councils of two rival ſtates.

In this ſtate of affairs, the lords having ſent a bill to the commons by a maſter in chancery, and a clerk aſſiſtant, the whole houſe conſidered it as an indignity, and would not accept the meſſage till they had examined the journals, to know if there were any precedents of ſending bills in that manner. In the courſe of a haſty and paſſionate debate, which enſued upon this occaſion, ſeveral gentlemen mentioned, that, on the firſt day of the preſent ſeſſions, they had been rudely turned out of the houſe of lords, even before the ſpeaker could get out of the door. A motion was then made to appoint a committee to ſearch for precedents, of the manner of bills being ſent from the lords, and alſo of the improper behaviour of the lords to the commons. Exceptions, however, were taken to the word improper, as if it had carried an appearance of prejudging the caſe; and, after a warm debate, the word was left out.

The report of the committee was, that the lords had behaved in a very improper manner, and that the bill, which ſtill lay on the table, ſhould be ſent back. This was oppoſed by adminiſtration, who ſaid it would lay a foundation for a quarrel, which might not be eaſily accommodated; and accordingly the motion was over-ruled.

A motion was then made for a conference with the lords, but over-ruled in the ſame manner as the other; and after long debates, and ſeveral propoſed amendments, the matter ended in a meſſage to the lords, in which the impropriety of the meſſengers was the only complaint ſtated, which, it was hoped, would not be drawn into a precedent. This produced an anſwer, that the bill had been ordered in the uſual manner, and that the matter of complaint was occaſioned by the illneſs of one of the perſons who ſhould have preſented it; that a good correſpondence was wiſhed for, and that it was not meant to introduce any precedent contrary to eſtabliſhed uſage.

On the ninth of June, his majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and, in his ſpeech from the throne, took notice of the laudable conduct of his parliament, that had conducted the affairs of the public with ſuch ſpirit and prudence. He thanked them for the care they had taken of his family, in making the act relating to the royal family; and they were informed of the pacific diſpoſition of thoſe powers with whom we had any concern. That there was great reaſon to believe, that the public tranquillity would not be diſturbed. As for the ſupplies granted by the commons, they were thanked in the moſt cordial manner; and great joy was expreſſed, that there were ſtill ſome hopes of being able to reduce the national debt.

No doubt was made but they would carry to their reſpective countries the ſame principles and the ſame zeal for the public good, which they had already manifeſted; and that they would cultivate a ſpirit of harmony and confidence among all ranks of the people; to convince them, that without a due reverence for the laws, neither their civil or religious rights could be enjoyed in comfort or ſecurity; and to aſſure them, that their intereſts were conſidered as inſeparably connected with thoſe of the crown; and that his majeſty is, and ever was perſuaded, that the proſperity and glory of his reign muſt depend on his poſſeſſing the affections, and maintaining the happineſs of his people. The parliament was then prorogued; which leads us, during its receſs, to conſider the ſtate of affairs on the continent. The firſt thing that engages our attention is, the revolution that took place in the government of Sweden.

It is acknowledged, by moſt of thoſe who have written of Sweden, that no nation in general ever enjoyed more liberty. Though governed by kings, theſe kings were originally elected by the people, and their power circumſcribed within very narrow limits. The ſenate, in a manner, exerciſed the whole executive power; and the general diets, compoſed of repreſentatives from the nobility, clergy, burgeſſes, and peaſants. Here we find a happy mixture of power, and ſuch as had not been known in any other European nation theſe many years; for all ranks of people were repreſented in their diets, or parliaments. It was not, however, without its defects; for the power of the diet being great, ſuch as compoſed it often played the tyrant over their dependents or tenants, which made the people wiſh for a change of government.

About the time of the reformation, the popiſh clergy in Sweden had become ſo odious to the people, that they embraced the doctrines of Luther, and the proteſtant religion was eſtabliſhed among them. From that time forward, Sweden began to emerge from obſcurity; and ſeveral worthy princes having, for about a century, conducted the affairs of government, it became at laſt a flouriſhing nation. But good princes are not of continual ſucceſſion. Charles XI. was a bold, domineering tyrant, and joining cunning to the natural cruelty of his diſpoſition, he ſoon aboliſhed the power of the ſenate by aſſuming it to himſelf, while the ſtates were forced, by a military power, to give up all pretence to legiſlation. By the ſame, or ſimilar methods, he greatly enlarged the dominions of Sweden, by new conqueſts; and, at his death in 1696, left it one of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles XII. who inherited the intrepidity, obſtinacy, harſhneſs, and violence of his father, without any of his diſſimulation. He carried deſpotiſm to a ſtill greater height; for he threw by all the forms of law, and decided peremptorily in every thing, without admitting of any diſcuſſion. The events of this prince's life are too well known to be recited here, only that his invincible obſtinacy, and implacable diſpoſition, brought on his ruin, after a life ſpent in heroic adventures and abſurd purſuits, which ſeemed to border on madneſs. He found his nation when he aſcended the throne, at the higheſt pitch of glory; but he left it reduced to miſery.

His ſiſter received the crown from the ſtates and the ſenate, to be held by her in the ſame manner as in ancient times; ſo that from the bleſſings of a mild government, the nation began to aſſume a new form, and to recover from the miſeries into which it had been plunged. In this manner things had been conducted with great prudence, till the death of the late king; and his preſent majeſty, when he aſcended the throne, made ſuch proteſtations of his doing nothing without their advice and conſent, that thoſe perſons who are well acquainted with the heart of man, and the common occurrences of life, would have imagined that he intended to deceive.

But notwithſtanding all theſe plauſible pretences and the ſtrenuous endeavours of the court party, no relaxation could be obtained in the articles which reſtricts the regal power, although the coronation had been delayed a conſiderable time for that purpoſe. The king was obliged to ſign all the articles in their original form, without any ſingle exception, and even to confirm them by oath. Indeed the articles were ſo numerous, and ſo reſtrictive, that ſcarce any prince could have been brought to comply with them; but this king had ſo repeatedly profeſſed republican principles, that it might have been ſaid they were framed by himſelf.

Theſe affairs being ſettled, the coronation was conducted in the moſt magnificent manner, and every demonſtration of joy was diſplayed on that occaſion. He was next day waited on by the ſenate and the four orders of the diet, and the ſpeech made to them by the king, was one of the moſt lively and animated that we meet with in hiſtory. There was, however, ſomething of ambiguity in it; for ſpeaking of the articles he had ſigned, he ſaid, "Unhappy is that king who wants the tie of oaths to ſecure himſelf on the throne, and who, not aſſured of the hearts of his ſubjects, is conſtrained to reign by the laws, when he cannot by the love of his people." Such was the manner in which this prince began his reign, and what were his views will appear afterwards.

The diet ſtill continued ſitting, when thoſe ſchemes that been long hatching began to reveal themſeves. As it was neceſſary the experiment ſhould be made at a conſiderable diſtance from the capital, in order that it might, in ſome degree, operate before the ſenate or diet ſhould receive information of it, and might thereby acquire a conſiderable degree of ſtrength, before their attempt to cruſh it could take place, it was reſolved that it ſhould break out where ſuch of the military were quartered as the court could confide in.

Scania, a province in the ſouth-weſt extremity of Sweden, and about two hundred and fifty miles from Stockholm, was the place pitched upon; for as that province is only ſeparated from Denmark by the Sound, conſequently great numbers of the military are conſtantly quartered in it. It was agreed, that the king ſhould remain in Stockholm; that his brother, prince Charles, ſhould ſet out for Chriſtianſtadt, under pretence of meeting his mother, who had been on a viſit to the court of Berlin; and prince Frederick Adolphus, went into the neighbouring province of Oſtragothia, which lies in the way from Stockholm, under pretence of drinking the mineral waters.

Every thing being now in as good order as poſſible, one Hellichins, a captain of foot, having brought over his company to join him, the magazines and arms were ſeized on, and then he cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed and diſtributed among the people to the following purport: That thoſe perſons who called themſelves the ſtates of Sweden, had not only uſurped that power, but had likewiſe by their arbitrary proceeding brought the nation to a ſtate of ruin: that they had entered into foreign connections without the conſent of either the king or the people; and altho' the people were in a manner ſtarving, yet no corn had been brought into the country to relieve their preſſing neceſſities: that under pretence of promoting the good of the ſubjects, they had made the moſt oppreſſive taxes: that they had ſtripped the king of the regal power, and left him no more than an empty title; ſo that however willing he might be to redreſs their grievances, yet it was not in his power. For theſe reaſons, and for many others that might be mentioned, they renounced all allegiance to this pretended diet, and exhorted all faithful Swedes to join with them in ſuppreſſing an order that had brought ſuch evils upon the kingdom. They concluded, in the faſhionable ſtrain, with an appeal to heaven, of the rectitude of their motives and intentions, at the ſame time, begging for the divine bleſſing upon their undertakings.

From theſe particulars it will appear, that this manifeſto had been firſt fabricated in the king's cabinet; and that Hellichins, who publiſhed it, was no more than a tool for that purpoſe, and had previouſly been inſtructed to act his part. The whole garriſon of Chriſtianſtadt declared in favour of the manifeſto, and they were ſoon joined by vaſt numbers of peaſants from different parts of the country.

Prince Charles, who was then at Carelſcroon, no ſooner heard of the revolt, than he aſſembled the forces in the neighbourhood, and took upon him the command of the garriſon, in which was a great magazine of arms and ammunition. He then cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed, of ſo myſterious a nature, that no perſon could well know what part he intended to act. He ſaid, he could not behold with indifference the flames of civil war breaking out in his dear native country; and therefore he was determined to ſuppreſs the inſurrection, and deſired that all thoſe who wiſhed well to their country, would follow his ſtandard. Accordingly, having placed ſuch a garriſon in Carelſcroon as he could depend on, he put himſelf at the head of the remainder of the troops, and began his march to Chriſtianſtadt, with ſeveral pieces of cannon. His brother prince Frederick, taking the ſame advantage of the inſurrection, put himſelf at the head of the troops in Oſtragothia, before any news had reached Stockholm. In the mean time general Rudbeck, who happened to be then in Oſtragothia, ſet out for Stockholm, and having informed the ſenate of theſe proceedings, and ſhewn them prince Charles's manifeſto, there remained no doubt what were the real intentions of the court.

As the guards were firmly attached to the king, the ſenate did not chuſe to truſt them, nor did they conſult the king upon any thing. They ordered the burghers to put themſelves under arms, and take their ſtations in different parts of the city, under the command of count Halling, who was alſo conſidered as prime miniſter. All this time the king ſeemed perfectly eaſy; but when the ſenate ſent him an order to ſign for recalling his brother, he refuſed to do it; but the refuſal was not regarded, for they put both the king's ſeal and name to it.

Though the king ſeemed totally inactive with reſpect to theſe important tranſactions, yet it is evident that he was taking the moſt effectual meaſures to accompliſh the great deſign he had in view; to the ſucceſs of which nothing contributed ſo much as the ſecrecy and ſilence with which they were conducted. The Senate had ſent for two regiments from Upland, and upon their arrival, the king aſſembled the ſenate, demanding to know why they had ſent for troops without his conſent. Upon that they, in a manner, commanded him to ſhew them ſome letters that had been ſent him by his brothers? but this he refuſed to comply with in the moſt poſitive manner. The altercation between him and the ſenators grew warm; and one of them proceeded ſo far as to attempt to ſeize his ſword, upon which he boldly drew it; and the ſenators were ſo much frightened, that he had an opportunity of getting out of the door, which he locked behind him, and put the key in his pocket.

Having thus cooped up the ſenators, he went to the guard-room, where he aſſembled the officers, and made a long ſpeech to them, complaining of the miſeries the people groaned under from the abuſe of power in the ſenators, and that this cruel tyranny became every day more and more intolerable.

He told them further, that he was determined to run all hazards to get rid of of them, and aſked the officers whether they would not aſſiſt their king in ſhaking off ſo ignominious a yoke, and reſtore the nation to its antient liberty. To this propoſal the officers in general aſſented with great readineſs, as well as the ſoldiers; upon which the king aſked them, if they would take an oath of allegiance to him, which they as readily complied with.

Every thing being thus far conducted, the king, in conſequence of a previous conſultation with his friends, had a white linen handkerchief round his arm, as a ſignal; upon which many of the nobility and gentry flocked to him. He then put himſelf at the head of the guards, and ſeized on all the magazines, without ſo much as one perſon venturing to oppoſe him.

The whole garriſon of Stockholm, although commanded by baron Rudbeck, who hated the king, deſerted their leader, and followed the king's ſtandard. The old baron ran with his ſword drawn, thro' the ſtreets, calling out to the people to take arms in defence of their liberties; but it was too late, for they imagined they might live as happily under one tyrant, as under five hundred.

Thus, in a large nation, a revolution was brought about without bloodſhed, tumult, or the leaſt oppoſition; while the people flocked together in the ſame inoffenſive manner as if they had been going to ſee ſome holyday ſports. The king then repaired to the caſtle, where having aſſembled the foreign miniſters, he told them, that it was with the utmoſt reluctance that he had been obliged to take ſuch a ſtep, as would ſurprize all Europe; but the ſafety of his own perſon, and the ſecurity of the ſtate, rendered it abſolutely neceſſary. He entreated them to inform their reſpective courts, that his motives, when made known would juſtify him; and that this affair ſhould not make the leaſt alteration in his conduct with reſpect to the other European powers. The next morning all the magiſtrates took an oath to obey none but the king, and ſuch of the ſenators or deputies who refuſed to take it, were committed to priſon, and told, that unleſs they complied within one month, they muſt for ever depart out of the kingdom.

The following day being appointed for aboliſhing the old form of government, and the eſtabliſhment of the new, the king ordered the ſtates to be aſſembled for that purpoſe. Previous to this, guards had been placed round the hall of the palace, ſo that there was not the leaſt doubt but his orders would be punctually obeyed. The king entered the hall in his regalia, and having made a long ſpeech, complaining of the ſenate for having preſumed to act as if in a legiſlative capacity, without power from the diet. He ſaid, that the diet on the one hand, and the ſenate on the other, ſeemed to claim each a ſeparate power, while he himſelf, though honoured with the title of king, enjoyed no more than the ſhadow of royalty. He concluded by telling them, that the ſenate had actually preſumed to receive ſubſidies from foreign powers, whoſe counſels governed Sweden; but that he would now aſſert the honour of his crown, and promote the intereſts of all his loyal and peaceable ſubjects.

The king took a moſt ſolemn oath, by which he renounced all claims to arbitrary power; after which he cauſed the new form of government to be read. It conſiſted of fifty-ſeven articles, but they may be all comprized in the following: that the king ſhall, for the future, chuſe the ſenate, or, in other words, he ſhould appoint to that office ſuch as he approved of: that he ſhall aſſemble the ſtates when he pleaſes, and likewiſe, when he pleaſes, diſſolve their meeting, ſo as they have ſat one time full three months: that the taxes ſhall be granted by the ſtates; but if not granted within three months after their meeting, then the old ones ſhall be levied. In caſe of any ſudden exigence, ſuch as the fear of invaſion, the king ſhall impoſe taxes till ſuch time as the ſtates can be called together: that when the ſtates are aſſembled, they are not to deliberate on any thing but what the king ſhall cauſe to be laid before them: that the king ſhall have full power to diſpoſe of the army and navy in whatever manner he pleaſes, and likewiſe to give away all places, either in the civil or military departments.

When all the articles were read, the king ſtood up, and aſked the ſtates, Whether they would give their oath to obſerve this form of government? As they knew that it was in vain to diſpute, they all conſented with one voice; after which they were immediately ſworn in the king's preſence, and the ſpeakers of each order ſigned a bond in name of the reſt.

The great work being thus finally accompliſhed, the king ſtood up, and told them, that it was neceſſary they ſhould return thanks to God for bringing about ſo happy an event, without the effuſion of human blood; and then pulling a book out of his pocket, the whole aſſembly joined with him in ſinging Te Deum, according to the cuſtom of the Lutherans. They were then permitted to kiſs his hand; after which the king departed, and the ſtates ſeparated, without knowing whether they were ever to meet again.

Next day, all the old ſenators were diſmiſſed, and, in their room, fifteen noblemen were appointed, on whoſe attachment to him he could, with the moſt unſhaken confidence, rely.

This prince was too much of a politician not to ingratiate himſelf with the lower claſs of people; and as the diſtreſſes of the poor were then very great, in order to throw the greater odium on the ſenate, he cauſed ten thouſand meaſures of meal to be diſtributed among them, each meaſure weighing twenty pounds; which, although far from being ſufficient to relieve all their wants, anſwered the end deſigned, namely, to endear himſelf the more to them. He alſo cauſed the diet of the ſtates to be aſſembled. But now every thing ſeemed totally changed; for, inſtead of enquiring into the conduct of the king, as had been cuſtomary on former occaſions, each order of the ſtates ſtrove who ſhould be the firſt to flatter him, and every thing he aſked was granted, without one diſſenting voice. The ſupplies were granted in the moſt laviſh manner; and a ſecret committee being choſen from each order of the ſtates, to aſſiſt the ſenate, the king diſmiſſed them, and they returned to their reſpective habitations with as much good humour as if he had been conferring with them on the moſt valuable privileges.

It may be conſidered as one of the extraordinary circumſtances of this extraordinary revolution, that not a drop of blood, either by legal or military execution, was ſhed in the progreſs, or in conſequence of it: a ſtriking inſtance, how much the manners of mankind have been ſoftened within a few ages; and, that whatever progreſs the meaner or buſier qualities of the mind may have made, the more terrible ones, which proceed from cruelty and ferocity, are, in a great meaſure, worn out. Indeed, too much cannot be ſaid of the extraordinary wiſdom and ſuperior abilities diſplayed by the king in the whole of his conduct. The profound diſſimulation with which he covered his deſigns, by putting on the republican cloak, ſo as to elude the eyes of a whole nation, and to eſcape the vigilant attention of thoſe whom age and experience had rendered both cautious and ſuſpicions, cannot be paralleled in hiſtory, eſpecially when we conſider that it was performed by one ſo young. He never ſeemed irritated by any paſſion, but ſolidity regulated his judgment, and prudence directed his hands.

While the king of Sweden was diſplaying the greateſt abilities in ſetting up a new form of government, the ſtate of public affairs in Denmark aſſumed a new face. The king had, for ſome time, made choice of one favourite after another; but ſcarcely had any of them gained a ſhare of his friendſhip and confidence, than they were diſcarded with peculiar marks of diſgrace. Great hopes had been formed of this prince when he aſcended the throne, and as great diſappointments followed; for the king, who governs his ſubjects by the advice of foreigners, can never be popular in his own dominions; and, without the love of the people, ſovereignty is but an odious name.

Among others who, like needy adventurers, came to ſettle in Copenhagen, was one Strunſee, the ſon of a Lutheran miniſter in Holſtein. He was a young man of the moſt inſinuating addreſs, with ſome very good abilities, but profligate in his manners, and abandoned to every vice, not paying the leaſt regard to the moſt ſacred obligations, and treating religion with contempt.

It is amazing to conſider the rapid progreſs which this adventurer, and one Brandt, his companion, made by their inſinuating addreſs. They were both raiſed to the dignity of noblemen; and Strunſee was made prime miniſter, a circumſtance which could not fail of raiſing an honeſt indignation in the minds of the Daniſh nobility. By his advice, accompanied with that of his friend Brandt, all the old faithful counſellors were diſgraced and baniſhed; till at laſt the two favourites, grown giddy with power, could ſet no bounds to their madneſs, but even treated the king with contempt.

It cannot be ſuppoſed that the ſubjects of any kingdom, even the moſt deſpotic, could bear long with ſuch inſolence. To have done ſo, would have been a diſgrace to them as men, and remained a ſtriking proof, that they were unworthy of a place in human ſociety. Accordingly a conſpiracy was formed, and, to give it the greater ſanction, the queen-dowager, ſecond wife of the late king, was at the head of it. Every thing being ripe for execution, a maſked ball was given at court on the ſixteenth of January, and, as ſoon as it was over, the king, who ſeemed to labour under great weakneſs of mind, retired to reſt. He had not, however, been long in bed, when the principal conſpirators came into his chamber, and told him, that the reigning queen, with Strunſee and Brandt, were that inſtant employed in drawing up a paper, which they would force him to ſign; the contents of which were, that he was to renounce the crown. The queen-dowager told him, that there was no way of ſaving himſelf, but by ſigning an order to take into cuſtody the reigning queen, with the two odious favourites; and the poor weak prince, overcome by fear, readily complied. The warrant was immediatrly executed, and the queen, with the two favourites, were committed to different priſons. The queen was afterwards ſent to the caſtle of Cronenburg, where ſhe remained ſome time very cloſely confined, but, by the interpoſition of her royal brother, the king of Great-Britain, ſhe was ſet at liberty, and ſuffered to reſide at Zell, in the electorate of Hanover, with a penſion equal to her dignity.

But the fate of the two favourites was otherwiſe determined. They were confined in cloſe dungeons, and not allowed any thing to ſubſiſt on but bread and water, nor were their beards ſuffered to be ſhaved. They were examined from time to time during the ſpace of two months, and threatened with being put to the torture, unleſs they made an open confeſſion. At laſt ſentence of death was paſſed upon them, that they ſhould have their right hands cut off, and then their heads; and that, after their quarters had been expoſed on the wheel, they ſhould be placed on the moſt conſpicuous parts in the city. Accordingly, this ſentence was executed, in all its rigour, on the twenty-eighth day of April, on a ſcaffold near the city, in the midſt of a vaſt concourſe of people. They both behaved with greater decency and reſignation than might have been expected from men who had lived as they did. Strunſee in particular was extremely penitent, and prayed very devoutly with the miniſter who attended him. Such was the end of two men, who might have been ornamental members of ſociety, had they not aſpired to power which they had not proper abilities to manage.

On the twenty-ſixth day of November, the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech from the throne, informed the members, that his reaſon for calling them ſo ſoon, was to take into their conſideration ſome things of the utmoſt importance. He told them, that he had been informed, from the moſt undoubted authority, that the Eaſt-India Company was in a moſt diſtreſſed condition; and that, as many of his good ſubjects had their fortunes depending on the credit of that company, therefore its ſecurity was now become a national concern. He deſired them to take it into their immediate conſideration, and, if poſſible, lay down ſome rational plan, by which the intereſt and honour of the company might be reſtored, and every thing ſettled on the moſt permanent footing. He took notice, that he had the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the powers on the continent, that the peace of Europe would not be any farther diſturbed than ſo far as the war was carried on between the Turks and Ruſſians. He concluded by recommending to them the moſt prudent methods that could be made uſe of, in order to reduce the price of proviſions, as the diſtreſſes of the poor were not imaginary, but real; and that nothing would give him greater pleaſure, than to hear that thoſe diſtreſſes were alleviated.

As ſoon as the commons returned to their own houſe, Mr. Fitzpatrick, brother to the earl of Oſſory, moved, that a loyal addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, and introduced the motion with the following remarks. He ſaid, that the affairs of the Eaſt-India Company were in the moſt alarming and ruinous condition: that the immediate interpoſition of parliament was become highly indiſpenſable to their preſervation: that, in 1769, the company had agreed with the government to pay the ſum of four thouſand pounds at every time when their dividend amounted to twelve per cent. and ſo on in proportion till it fell to ſix, when that payment was to ceaſe: that this being the caſe, and the preſent diſtreſſed ſtate of the company ſo notorious, it would be neceſſary to make ſome proviſion adequate to the deficiency: that, ſo far from the company's being able to make a dividend of either twelve or ſix per cent. at the end of the next half year, it would be an act of the higheſt fraud in the directors to divide a ſingle ſhilling. Some of the members oppoſed the addreſs; but the vote being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very great majority, and preſented accordingly.

The firſt thing of importance which came under the conſideration of the houſe of commons, was the preſent ſtate of the navy, and this occaſioned very warm debates. The objections made by thoſe in oppoſition were to the following import. They ſaid, that the number of ſeamen was too great to be kept up in time of profound peace; and that we were at peace with all our neighbours, was declared in the ſpeech from the throne. It was further urged, that the miniſtry had not given in an account in what manner the ſupplies granted laſt year had been uſed, ſo that the houſe was left quite in the dark.

The miniſtry, on the other hand, had but little to ſay; only that they urged the neceſſity of keeping our navy on the moſt reſpectable footing; and ſet forth, that our fleet in the Eaſt-Indies was now much greater than formerly. Thoſe in oppoſition ſaid, that when the public granted money, they had a right to enquire in what manner it was to be laid out; that the utmoſt ſatisfaction ought to be given to thoſe who contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government: that ſome of thoſe employed in the building of ſhips for the royal navy, had added to them ſome very extraordinary decorations, which, although wholly unneceſſary, had been attended with great expence. It was added, that the ſlow payment of the navy bills was a great hardſhip to thoſe who advanced money on the credit of them; that ſuch an abuſe ought to be redreſſed before any farther ſupplies were granted: that it was very ſurpriſing, that, after the declaration from the throne, that we were in the moſt profound ſtate of peace, as many men ſhould be aſked for as if we were at war with the moſt formidable power in Europe.

Upon the whole, the arguments were carried on with great heat by thoſe in oppoſition; and certainly nothing could be more reaſonable than to lay before the people a ſtate of the public affairs, that they might be ſatisfied whether their money had been laid out in promoting the purpoſes for which it was given. It was aſked, If a naval force muſt be kept up in the Eaſt-Indies, what end was it to anſwer? Had we any enemy to oppoſe in that part of the world; and if ſo, who was that enemy? What armament had been ſent into thoſe ſeas to diſturb our ſettlements, or haraſs our trade? It was further aſked, in an ironical manner, Whether the Chineſe had fitted out a fleet, whether we had any pirates to contend with, and whether the ghoſt of the famous Angria had made its appearance on the theatre of this world? If no anſwer could be made to theſe queſtions, if no reaſon could be aſſigned for keeping up ſuch a ſtrong naval force, then the motion ought to be rejected, and no money granted for that purpoſe, ſeeing there was no reaſon for it; unleſs it was to burthen the people with unneceſſary taxes. But, notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, no ſooner was the queſtion put, than it was carried for the miniſtry by a great majority, and the ſupplies were granted.

A motion was then made to enquire into the nature of thoſe cauſes which occaſioned the dearth of all ſorts of proviſions, but nothing was done that could be of any real ſervice to the public. Several regulations, indeed, were made with reſpect to bread, and ſome reſtrictions laid upon the bakers; but, unleſs the rents of landed eſtates and farms can be lowered, by the retrenchment of different ſpecies of luxury, the legiſlature itſelf will never be able to remedy the evils complained of. To redreſs any grievances, nothing can be more proper, nothing more ſalutary, than to begin with the effects, and trace them up to the original cauſes from whence they ſpring. In vain does the legiſlative power lay the inferior order of tradeſmen under ſome ſort of reſtrictions, when, at the ſame time, it is well known that, unleſs the cauſes are removed, the effects muſt remain in the ſame ſtate as before. Moſt of thoſe who compoſe our houſes of parliament are landholders; and if they know that the rents of their farms are double to what they were twenty years ago, conſequently, the prices of all ſorts of proviſions muſt riſe in proportion.

A ſecret committee having been appointed to enquire into the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company's affairs, it was found, by their report, that the affairs of the company were both perplexed, and very much diſtreſſed. It was therefore propoſed, that ſuperviſors ſhould be ſent out to the Eaſt-Indies, to make a proper enquiry how far the officers and ſervants belonging to the company had abuſed the truſt repoſed in them, and to have power to grant redreſs to all thoſe who thought themſelves in the leaſt injured. Some of the members whoſe fortunes lay in the Eaſt-India ſtock, made ſtrong objections to this bill, while thoſe who ſupported it retorted upon them, by declaring, that nothing but oppreſſion had been carried on in that part of the world; and as the company had, either directly or indirectly, encouraged ſuch practices, it was now high time to call them to an account for their conduct, and prevent them, for the future, from acting in ſuch a manner as could ſerve no other end beſides that of diſgracing themſelves, and bringing a real diſhonour upon the nation. At laſt the motion was carried in the uſual manner; and ſupervisors were appointed, with plenary powers to make a proper enquiry into all the abuſes complained of, and to rectify them as far as lay in their power.

A motion was next made to enquire into the ſtate of the army; and particularly, whether it was neceſſary that we ſhould, in times of peace, keep up ſuch a ſtrong military force as ſeemed of no other uſe but to impoveriſh the nation, and to be ready at all times to ſupport the arbitrary dictates of a miniſter. It was ſaid by thoſe who promoted the motion, that the national militia was at all times able to preſerve us from our enemies at home; and as for ſuch ſettlements as we had abroad, a very ſmall force was ſufficient, eſpecially as we were not engaged in a war with any of the powers on the continent. In anſwer to this, the miniſtry ſaid, that all other European nations kept up ſtanding armies, and therefore it was, in a manner, neceſſary that we ſhould do the ſame, otherwiſe, if a war was to break out, we ſhould be utterly unprepared, and, conſequently, we ſhould be expoſed to many unforeſeen dangers.

A. D. 1773. The holidays being ended, the parliament met purſuant to their laſt adjournment, and took into conſideration the acts relating to penalties inflicted on thoſe who infringed the laws reſpecting the preſervation of the game. This ſubject is of the utmoſt importance to the inhabitants of a free country, and therefore it was diſcuſſed both upon natural and municipal principles. It is certain that every thing which ſeems to have an exiſtence upon natural principles, will at all times attract the notice of the public; and ſuch as may, probably, have no concern in the diſpute, will, notwithſtanding, intereſt themſelves in it. Thus a wild beaſt in the fields has been, time immemorial, conſidered as the property of the public; and if either its fleſh or ſkin were of any value, then the perſon who took or killed it was to conſider it as his own. In proof of this, it may be added, that ſome of the Anglo-Saxon kings remitted the tax which the Welſh uſed to pay, upon condition that they produced a certain number of wolves heads, by which means that deſtructive ſpecies of animals was eradicated out of the country.

On the other hand, it was urged, that whatever might be the privileges belonging to men in a ſtate of nature, they were all cancelled as ſoon as civil ſociety took place: that all municipal laws were made for the good of ſociety, and in the preamble to every act, reaſons were aſſigned for the conduct of the legiſlative power. One reaſon, indeed, was declared to be unanſwerable, and that was, that in a commercial nation, where every perſon is ſuppoſed to get his living by honeſt induſtry, gaming in general ought to be laid under the ſevereſt reſtrictions: that poaching, or killing of game, led the lower order of people away from their lawful employments; and while they were ſpending their time in taking a hare or a fox, their families were left to ſtarve: that although the laws made for the preſervation of the game might ſeem to interfere with private property, yet they were ſuch as would ſtand warranted by good ſenſe and ſober reaſon. Nothing, however, was done on this ſubject; and we are ſorry to ſay, that thoſe who pretended to ſtand up for the natural rights of mankind, were ſuch as had, in the opinion of the public, trampled on ſome of the moſt ſacred moral obligations. The miniſtry promoted the bill, in order to acquire ſome ſhare of popularity; the patriots oppoſed it for the ſake of oppoſition. It was then moved in the houſe, that a bill ſhould be brought in to enable foreigners to lend money on the credit of ſome of our Weſt-India ſettlements; and the reaſon for this motion was, that many foreigners who had money to lend on real ſecurity, would be glad to lay it out in that manner, if they could only have it in their power to recover their debts according to the common law of England. It was further urged, that ſuch a practice would, in a great meaſure, reduce the price of ſugar, and, at the ſame time, our colonies would become more reſpectable than ever. That the intereſt of the colonies and the mother-country were reciprocal; there was no line to be drawn between them, becauſe they muſt ſtand or fall together; they were links of the ſame chain, wheels of the ſame machine; and no ſooner was one diſcompoſed, than all the reſt went into a ſtate of confuſion.

Some diſorders having happened in the Weſt-Indies, a committee was appointed to make a proper enquiry into the cauſes, and to report to the houſe, whether the things complained of originated from the arbitrary proceedings of the governors, or the refractory conduct of the people. The miniſtry did all they could to ſupport this enquiry, but, after the committee had examined a great number of witneſſes, no ſatisfactory account could be obtained, and things ſtood on the ſame footing as before.

Monopolies, the curſe of every commercial ſtate, came next before the houſe; and the principal queſtion agitated was, whether thoſe engaged in partnerſhip ſhould be obliged to part with their real eſtates, in order to ſatisfy the demands which their creditors had upon them, in conſequence of a commercial copartnerſhip. One would think that nothing can be more equitable than that of a man's giving up his all for the benefit of his creditors, notwithſtanding any connections he may happen to have; but notwithſtanding, the motion was violently oppoſed, and there is reaſon to fear that ſuch a beneficial inſtitution will not take place in the preſent age.

An affair of great importance now came on before the houſe, which, had it been properly attended to, would, in a great meaſure, have reſtored the conſtitution of this country to its original principles. The queſtion was as follows, Whether it is not conſiſtent with the conſtitution of this country, that every ſeſſions of parliament ſhould be itſelf a real parliament, that the people might have an opportunity, from time to time, to ſend ſuch perſons to repreſent them as ſhould ſeem worthy of their choice.

This naturally leads us to take ſome view of the ancient parliaments of this and other European nations, who roſe on the ruins of the Roman empire.

As the people are the fountain of power, and as the rights which princes enjoy are no more than delegated, therefore it is no more than reaſonable that the people ſhould be repreſented. This repreſentation was originally the right of all thoſe who choſe to act for their neighbours; but, in time, it was found ſo burthenſome, that four ſhillings per day for knights of the ſhires, and two ſhillings for burgeſſes, was allowed to all thoſe who gave due attention to the affairs of parliament. Parliaments were called as often as the ſovereign thought proper; but prorogation and diſſolution ſeem to have been ſynonimous terms till the reign of Henry VI. when the unhappy wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter took place. From that time till the ſucceſſion of queen Elizabeth, there ſeems to have been no fixed rule, till we come to the revolution, when it was ordered that a new parliament ſhould be ſummoned to meet once in three years, and to continue during the whole of that time, either by ſitting or prorogation. This was an attempt towards political reformation, and, perhaps, as much as could have been then effected, conſiſtent with the ſtate of public affairs; but ſtill it called for amendment. No man is infallible, and it is well known that there are but few who can withſtand the force of a bribe. This has at all times given wicked miniſters the power of trampling on the rights of their country, by bringing over a majority to be, as it were, a ſtanding council. But however great the evils might be which aroſe from triennial parliaments, they were trifling when compared with thoſe which we ſhall now mention.

When the rebellion, which broke out in 1715, was quelled, the miniſtry, for reaſons now unknown to us, reſolved to take a cruel revenge. Many unhappy wretches were executed; and, had it not been for the natural humanity of the people, thouſands more would have ſhared the ſame fate. The miniſtry were ſo ſenſible of the general diſcontents of the people, that, in order to ſcreen themſelves from the effects of a parliamentary enquiry, a bill was brought in to make the then parliament to continue ſeven years; and the ſame rule was to take place in all future elections. Perhaps this was the firſt blow ſtruck at the root of our moſt excellent conſtitution, and the evils ariſing from it have been felt by all ranks of people in the nation.

To remedy thoſe evils, and, if poſſible, give the people leave to make a free choice as often as poſſible, a worthy patriot made a motion, that a bill might be brought in to ſhorten the duration of parliaments. This was what every honeſt man wiſhed for, becauſe, where the time or continuance of office is ſhort, the temptation muſt be ſmall. Reaſonable, however, as this motion was, there was a ſtrong majority againſt it; and, to the ſurprize of all thoſe who wiſhed well to the conſtitution, it was thrown out. Future ages will be ſurpriſed, when they read, that, in this age, ſuch an equitable motion ſhould be rejected by thoſe who profeſs themſelves the guardians of the rights of their fellow-ſubjects; but it is too true to be denied; and, till ſuch time as parliaments revert back to their original form, the people may complain without effect. In vain are they indulged in their choice, if the leaſt reſtriction is laid upon it; for freedom in common life is but one link of that chain which cements all the bodies in political ſociety.

It is certain that many patriots are ſtill to be found in this country; and although ſome of their ſchemes may happen to be overthrown, they ought to be held in the higheſt eſteem by all thoſe who wiſh well to their natural rights and privileges. Lord Howe moved, that a bill might be brought in to enable his majeſty to augment the pay of the naval officers, which, at that time, was too ſmall for their ſubſiſtence. This motion was ſupported by all thoſe who wiſhed well to the brave men, who undergo ten thouſand hardſhips which others never feel. But ſtill it was oppoſed by the miniſtry; for although the petition delivered by lord Howe, in name of the naval officers, was conceived in the moſt modeſt terms, yet ſuch was the malevolence of thoſe in office, that no regard was paid to it. It was ſaid, that the nation could not afford them any more; ſo that whatever their merits might be, yet, when it was conſidered that there was an utter impoſſibility of complying with their requeſt, they ought to reſt ſatisfied.

Indeed, the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who contended for ſo equitable an act, were far ſuperior to thoſe made uſe of on the other ſide; and we will venture to affirm, that the hardſhips ſuffered by naval officers are of ſuch a nature, that no rewards can be too great for them. Were but a few of the articles of luxury taken away, and, in room thereof, the ſame money given to reward and encourage thoſe brave men, who venture their lives for our ſafety, the nation would receive an additional honour.

A motion was then made, that the houſe ſhould reſolve itſelf into a committee, to enquire into the propriety of foreigners being connected in our trade to any parts of the world, excluſive of Europe. This motion took its riſe from the following cauſes, namely, the power granted to the lords of the admiralty to ſtop all ſhips which are not wholly the property of Britiſh ſubjects. It was proved, by the evidence of ſeveral witneſſes, that ſome ſhips had been detained at Graveſend a whole month, for no other reaſon, but becauſe part of the cargoes belonged to foreign merchants. The reſult of all this was, that leave was given to bring in a bill to remedy the evil complained of.

It is a maxim in the law of nature, that juſtice ſhould be freely adminiſtered at the expence of the whole community, becauſe it is ſuppoſed to be done for the preſervation of the whole; and it will often happen, eſpecially in large communities, that an innocent perſon may be accuſed of crimes, thrown into a priſon, and brought to a public trial. It is true, he may, from a variety of circumſtances, be able to prove his own innocence; yet, when the jury has acquitted him, he cannot be diſcharged, in many parts of England, till ſuch time as he has paid certain fees to the gaoler. Long, indeed, had this practice been a diſgrace to the nation, till, about forty years ago, the city of London, at the inſtance of baron Thompſon, their recorder, ſet the example, of diſcharging every priſoner, without fees, as ſoon as he was acquitted by the jury. The noble generoſity of the citizens of London was not, however, adopted by thoſe who lived in more diſtant counties. No proviſion was made to defray the expences of keeping the felons in priſon; ſo that inſtances were produced of ſome poor men lying a whole year in gaol, becauſe they could not pay their fees. To remedy an evil of ſo glaring a nature, a bill was brought in to oblige every county to make good all the deficiences incurred to the gaolers by keeping the priſoners. To the honour of the preſent age, let it be here remembered, that a bill, formed by the heart of charity, and ſupported by benevolence, paſſed with the almoſt unanimous conſent of the houſe. In conſequence of this humane reſolution, the priſoner who is now acquitted muſt be diſcharged without paying any fees. The verdict of the jury ſhall make him as free as if he had never been in priſon; he may go from the bar to his own family without being called in queſtion, or detained for any fees whatever; his impriſonment being conſidered as a great puniſhment after his innocence has been proved.

We have already taken notice, that both churchmen and diſſenters had applied to parliament for ſome relief in the article of ſubſcription; and although their requeſt was rejected at that time, yet they both renewed it afterwards. To a liberal and enlarged mind, it will appear, that there can be no medium in this affair between the churchmen and the diſſenters. Dr. Tucker, dean of Glouceſter, has written a treatiſe, wherein he proves, that all bodies or ſocieties, whether political or religious, have a right to impoſe ſome fief on thoſe who join with them. Now this applies to the eſtabliſhed church of England, which, as a national inſtitution, has heaped emoluments on its miniſters, and, conſequently, has a right to impoſe ſome teſt by which their orthodoxy may be known. It is different with reſpect to the diſſenters; they do not enjoy any of thoſe emoluments, nor can they be admitted to execute the duties of a civil office till they have taken the ſacramental teſt. Theſe conſiderations weighed ſtrongly with the houſe, and a bill to relieve the diſſenters actually paſſed by a great majority; but, when ſent up to the lords, it met with a warm oppoſition, and, in the end, was rejected.

The ſtate of the linen trade was the next object that attracted the notice of the houſe, and, undoubtedly, it is a ſubject which requires the utmoſt attention. In the manufactures of linen, not only men and women, but even children, are employed; and it may, with the utmoſt propriety, be ſaid to be the ſtaple commodity both of Ireland and Scotland. In both places, this uſeful art has been brought to great perfection; thouſands of uſeful ſubjects are employed in it, and therefore any thing to promote or injure it becomes a national concern. But, notwithſtanding the vaſt advantages ariſing to the community from this branch of trade, it ſeems to ſuffer in common with every thing elſe. The reaſon is obvious to any thinking perſon; for as the poor are, in general, employed in the different branches of that manufacture, ſo it is neceſſary that proviſions ſhould be cheap, in order that our merchants may be able to ſell their goods at foreign markets, at a lower price than our neighbours. But the preſent increaſe of luxury has induced our nobility and gentry to raiſe the rents of their eſtates, and, conſequently, the neceſſary proviſions have been enlarged in price at the ſame time, ſo that the poor could not live by the prices of their labour.

The importation of foreign linen was much inſiſted on by thoſe who had the intereſt of their country at heart; and ſeveral propoſals were made, that no foreign linen ſhould be imported. Perhaps no meaſure could have been more productive of the public good; but the great misfortune was, that the foreign linens were charged a certain duty, unleſs ſome ſcheme could be propoſed to make good the deficiency that would occur in the public imports; ſo that the motion was, for that time, thrown out.

With reſpect to the ſtate of affairs on the continent, particularly in Poland, and near the Danube, nothing deciſive happened during the whole of this year. Many different engagements happened, indeed, between the Turks and the Ruſſians, but both parties continued ſtill in ſuch an uncertain ſtate, that they were obliged to act on the defenſive. Some propoſals, indeed, were made by both parties, towards bringing about a laſting peace, but nothing was done, for the Ruſſians were high in their demands, and the Turks were too proud to comply. The king of Pruſſia, that great politician and general, to whom even reſt is painful, propoſed, that the wretched kingdom of Poland ſhould be divided into three parts, in the following manner. That vaſt, extenſive tract of land, reaching from the Boriſthenes to Muſcovy, was to be ceded to the empreſs of Ruſſia; the emperor of Germany was to have the ſouthern parts of Great Poland, from Warſaw to Cracovia, and from thence to the confines of Hungary. All that part of Poland which reaches from Warſaw along the Oder and Viſtula to Dantzick, and afterwards along the coaſt of the Baltic Sea, were to be given to the king of Pruſſia. Thus a nation, one of the moſt fertile in Europe, after being torn in pieces by inteſtine diviſions, was to become the property of three mighty ſovereigns who had no right to it beſides that of lawleſs power. The great object the artful king of Pruſſia had in view, was to ſeize the opulent town of Dantzick, in order to open a trade to Peterſburgh through the Sound, and to all the other mercantile ſtates in Europe. This was one of the boldeſt ſtrokes that could have been ſtruck; but in all things the king of Pruſſia is ſuch a maſter in politics, as well as the art of war, that nothing ſeems too difficult for him; the univerſe itſelf is not capable of ſetting bounds to his ambition, although his advanced years ſeem to threaten a decay of nature.

During the whole of this year, vaſt numbers of people emigrated from Scotland, and the north of England, to ſettle in America. To to an ingenuous, rational, thinking perſon, this emigration of the people from the mother-country to the colonies, muſt have the moſt alarming aſpect. It is an indication of the approaching ruin of a ſtate; and nothing is more neceſſary, than that thoſe in power ſhould make a proper enquiry into the ſources from whence ſuch miſchiefs flow. It is a certain fact, that the madneſs of raiſing the rents of ſmall farms has reached even to the barren mountains of the highlands of Scotland; and, unleſs ſome ſtop is put to it, the conſequences will prove very fatal at laſt. It is not reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that people who work hard for a ſubſiſtence, will give more money, as the rents of an eſtate or farm, than the fruits of the earth will pay. What man in his right ſenſes would run himſelf into debt to his landlord, while, at the ſame time, he is under an indiſpenſible obligation of making a proper proviſion for his family? It is an indifferent matter to people where they thrive, whether in America or England; and it is certain, that in both places the ſame effects may be produced. This, however, may be ſaid in favour of the emigrants, that they act as rational creatures: they are oppreſſed in the moſt cruel manner by thoſe landlords whoſe ſubſiſtence depends on their honeſt induſtry: they cultivate the ground with the utmoſt care: they think to bring up their children uſeful members of ſociety; but no ſooner do they reap the fruits of the earth, from which they expect an adequate reward, than they find that even that property which they laid out is ſwallowed, and nothing is left for themſelves. Can they then be blamed for leaving that country which denies them the protection which every ſubject has a right to expect? There cannot, in the eye of humanity, be one reaſon urged againſt thoſe emigrations, nor can tyranny itſelf prevent them, unleſs all natural obligations are to be trampled on. The thing itſelf, however, ought to be attended to by thoſe who are proprietors of landed eſtates; for if the uſeful working people are thus to be driven out of the country, where are hands to be found to cultivate the ground? This may, in the end, render their eſtates of no manner of ſervice, and that ground which might have been cultivated at a moderate price will become a deſart.

In France, nothing of any importance happened this year. The people in that extenſive country are ſo well accuſtomed to thoſe chains of ſlavery firſt impoſed upon them by Lewis XI. that no oppreſſion ſeems too much for them to bear. The Spaniards continued to go on in their uſual indolent manner, while the Dutch continued to be the drudges of all thoſe who would employ them.

In Italy, the pope put a final end to the order of the Jeſuits; and thoſe fathers, who have ſo long domineered over the conſciences of men, are now become ſo truly deſpicable, that all nations have refuſed them an aſylum, except the king of Pruſſia, who has, at all times, made religion ſubſervient to politics.

A.D. 1774. We have already ſeen in what a troubled condition our colonies were; and, how they ſeem to be drawing towards that criſis, which will either connect them with the mother-country, or create ſuch diſturbances as will not be eaſily redreſſed.

The parliament met on the twenty-fifth of January, and the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, recommended to them to take into their ſerious conſideration the ſtate of the colonies, who ſeemed to be attempting to throw off all ſubjection to the Britiſh government. He told them, that the moſt ſalutary laws had been treated with contempt, and public acts of parliament had been deſpiſed, as if they had been the mandates of ſingle perſons: that the colonies were little better than in a ſtate of rebellion; and that, unleſs ſome vigorous meaſures were uſed to force them to obedience, all laws would be trampled under foot, and the regularity which took place among the different ranks of beings, would once more return to its original ſtate of confuſion. He concluded by recommending to them the ſtate of the gold coin, which had ſuffered much by the illicit practices of wicked perſons, and hoped they would put it on a ſolid foundation.

When the commons had returned to their own houſe, ſtrong debates enſued upon the words of the addreſs which ſhould be preſented to his majeſty. Thoſe in the intereſt of the court inſiſted, that an implicit acknowledgment ſhould be made, thanking his majeſty for his paternal care of the nation, and to promiſe that every reaſonable meaſure ſhould be complied with. On the other hand, it was urged by thoſe in oppoſition, that the colonies, ſo far from being in a ſtate of rebellion, were only contending for the enjoyment of thoſe rights and privileges which belong to all men in common as members of ſociety: that the mother-country had no right to tax thoſe emigrants, unleſs a conſent to that meaſure was firſt had and obtained from their own repreſentatives: that the colonies were not regularly, nor in any ſenſe whatever repreſented in the Britiſh parliament; and therefore, till ſuch time as that legal repreſentation took place, no taxes could, in juſtice, be impoſed upon them. As to the affair of the gold coin, it was (ſaid they) a great hardſhip to the honeſt, induſtrious trading part of the nation; and that the miniſtry ought, before any thing of that nature had been propoſed, to have laid down ſome rational plan by which the public would have been indemnified. Such were the outlines of the arguments made uſe of by both parties; but the queſtion being put to the vote, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the court.

The grand object which the government had in view, was to reduce the colonies to a ſtate of obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity they were under of being ſubject to the mother-country; and therefore a bill was brought in of a very coercive nature. Some perſons in the town of Boſton had plundered a ſhip which was ſent from England with tea; and as this was an act which infringed on private property, it called aloud for an exertion of the regal power. Accordingly an act paſſed to remove the cuſtoms from the town of Boſton, to quarter a military force upon the people, and to block up their harbour by ſeveral ſhips of war. It is not yet certain what will be the effects of this act, but it is to be hoped that all theſe diſputes between the mother-country and the colonies will ſubſide, and unanimity take place.

Many important affairs were diſcuſſed during this ſeſſions of parliament; particularly one for the regulation of all acts by which foreigners are to be naturalized. The freedom of this country is ſo great and uncircumſcribed, that many bad uſes have been made of it by deſigning perſons. To remedy an evil attended with ſo many deſtructive conſequences, a new law has been eſtabliſhed, by which no foreigner who is naturalized ſhall enjoy the privileges of a Britiſh ſubject, unleſs he reſides in the country. The gold coin has alſo been attended to with the ſtricteſt care, and there is reaſon to hope that, in a ſhort time, all the evils complained of will be redreſſed. Affairs of ſo much importance can have no connection with any party whatever, and, ſo far as they are promoted for the general good, they become of ſervice to the whole. Every thing by which the public is likely to be affected, ought to attract the notice of government; and where remedies can be found out, they ought to be applied. But here we are naturally led to take a view of ſuch tranſactions as have taken place on the continent of Europe during the beginning of this year.

When the war began between the Turks and Ruſſians, Europe in general was filled with a notion that it would have ſoon terminated in favour of the latter; but thoſe who are converſant with hiſtory, and acquainted with the revolutions which took place in this lower world, will not pay much regard to ſuch a conjecture. That the Turks were but little acquainted with the art of war when the Ruſſians firſt oppoſed them, is certain; but ſtill, it would be very improper to infer from thence, that they muſt always remain in the ſame ſtate of ignorance. Neceſſity brings hidden principles to life; and ſometimes it will happen, that the moſt illiterate barbarians will, in conſequence of oppoſition, acquire knowledge of what they deſpiſed before. This was the caſe with the Turks, who, in the groſſeſt ſenſe of the word, being ſlaves to ſuperſtition, could not bear the thoughts of receding from their ancient cuſtoms. Their janizaries declared, that as their country had been firſt conquered by their ſabres, therefore they would defend it by the ſame means. But nothing in the world could be more ridiculous, eſpecially as they had fire-arms to encounter; and therefore it was neceſſary that ſome blow ſhould be ſtruck at the root of their prejudices.

The French, ever willing to take part with the enemies of Great-Britain, and, at the ſame time, fearful leſt, in conſequence of the Turks being driven out of Europe, the houſe of Auſtria would become too formidable; and Ruſſia would penetrate into the German empire; ſent ſeveral of their moſt experienced officers to inſtruct the Turks in the art of war. Continual oppoſition made theſe barbarians wiſer than before; they ſaw the abſolute neceſſity they were under of having recourſe to military diſcipline, and the regular order of the Ruſſians enabled them to take the field in a much better manner than they had hitherto done. From this circumſtance alone we may naturally infer, that the longer the war continues between theſe contending powers, the more able the Turks will be to oppoſe the Ruſſians. Indeed, the climate bears hard againſt the latter; for it cannot be ſuppoſed, that men brought up in the cold deſarts of Ruſſia can reliſh the ſweets of a warmer climate, without being reduced to a ſtate of effeminacy. Thus we find that the climate of ancient Greece, the now ſeat of war, has fought more ſtrongly againſt the Ruſſians than the army of the Turks; nor is this to be wondered at, when we conſider that Greece has often enervated thoſe who conquered it.

Nor was it better with the Ruſſian fleet; for although the ſailors were kept under the ſtricteſt diſcipline, and had been inured to many hardſhips, yet no ſooner did they come into the Mediterranean ſea, than they were ſeized with many diſeaſes to which they had hitherto been ſtrangers. Reinforcements, indeed, have been ſent them from time to time; but ſtill they have never done any thing of real importance, nor have they been able to ſecond the operations of the army by land. The Italian ſtates have ſtill remained jealous of them, and the diſtance from their own country has prevented them from receiving the neceſſary ſupplies. There is no doubt but the Ruſſians will, in time, become as expert ſeamen as any other in Europe, but ſtill it requires ſome time before that can be brought about. Their beſt officers are not natives of the country, and, conſequently, it cannot be ſuppoſed that they will wiſh to promote its intereſt in the ſame manner as if they were immediately connected. Their naval diſcipline has alſo ſome remains of barbarity in it, which, at all times, muſt give offence to a generous mind; for what man would deſire to ſee his fellow creature puniſhed in ſuch a manner as is ſhocking to humanity?

Such, for ſome time, has been the ſtate of affairs between the Turks and Ruſſians, and there is reaſon to imagine that both the contending parties will end where they began; that the Ruſſians will exhauſt their treaſures to carry on the war, but the Turks, in conſequence of their internal reſources, will be able to tire them out.

It is true, the Ruſſians have made ſome bold attempts, ſince the commencement of the preſent year, in order to force their way towards Conſtantinople; but that appears in a chimerical light, eſpecially as both the ſeaſon and the climate war againſt them. Had the European princes conſidered their own intereſt, they would all have joined in ſupporting the Ruſſians in the preſent war; becauſe, in conſequence of the Turks being driven out of Europe, the whole trade of the Mediterranean would have been laid open to them, and the haughty Ottomans, who have ſo long domineered over their neighbours, would have been forced to acquieſce in that ſimple propoſition, that there is ſuch a thing as the law of nations, by which all civil ſocieties ought to be regulated, and by which every individual ought to make his proper claims.

The Britiſh miniſtry have been very active in providing for the ſafety of our fellow ſubjects who are ſettled, or have buſineſs to tranſact in the Eaſt-Indies. It had been long complained of, that the ſervants of the company, at their principal ſettlements, had acted in a very oppreſſive and illegal manner, nor indeed had any code of laws been made for their ſecurity. The vaſt diſtance from England rendered it difficult, and almoſt impoſſible, for any perſon to obtain redreſs. It was therefore reſolved on in council, that four gentlemen learned in the laws, and of the moſt approved integrity, ſhould be ſent over to Aſia, where we have ſettlements, and act there as judges. They are to hold pleas of the crown, determine in real, mixed and perſonal actions, to give judgment in all caſes of equity, in every thing relating to the revenue, ſo that their power includes all that is lodged in the courts of Weſtminſter-hall; but as the ſettlements are diſtant from each other, ſo the courts are not to be fixed, but to move from one place to another, that juſtice may be equally diſtributed to all ranks of people.

It is, perhaps, impoſſible to prevent abuſes, unleſs nature itſelf could be changed; but certainly the government could have done no more for the good of our ſubjects in India, than that of ſending out judges. It will ſerve to give ſome reſpect to the laws, and impreſs mens minds with a reverence for juſtice. The ſalaries of the judges being very large, it will ſet them above temptation to corrupt actions; and their authority extending over all ranks of perſons, the rich will not have it in their power to oppreſs the poor.

But the greateſt parliamentary buſineſs was, the manner in which the ſupplies was to be raiſed; and it muſt be acknowledged that the miniſter, whatever may be his other qualities, diſcovered himſelf to be an able politician, and a perfect maſter of calculations.

On the tenth of May the French king departed this life, and was ſucceeded by the preſent king, his grandſon, a young prince about twenty years of age, married to one of the ſiſters of the emperor of Germany. The late king was born January 15, 1710, and in 1715 ſucceeded his great grandfather, his own father, grandfather, ſeveral uncles and brothers having all died of the ſmall-pox. As he was only five years of age when he was crowned, his uncle the duke of Orleans was, as firſt prince of the blood, appointed regent during his minority. But the king took the reins of government upon himſelf when he was little more than ſixteen years of age, having previouſly married the only daughter of the good Staniſlaus, once king of Poland, and afterwards duke of Lorrain. His great miniſter for ſome years was the cardinal Fleury, a man who had acquired all the knowledge of courts that could be obtained in a cloſe attendance to buſineſs above ſixty years; but when he died, the king reſolved to govern as much as poſſible without the aſſiſtance of favourites.

We have already ſeen that he carried on two bloody and expenſive wars againſt Britain; in one of which he was very ſucceſsful; but in the other, namely, the laſt, his nation, army and navy were, in a manner, totally ruined. In his perſon Lewis XV. was extremely handſome, and had a moſt engaging countenance. In attending on public buſineſs, he was very regular; but he has been blamed for too ſtrong an attachment to the army. This, however, ought to be conſidered as the reigning taſte of France, and not ſolely the foible of the ſovereign. The French have never yet, in the midſt of all their refinements, been able to diveſt themſelves of that barbarous notion which was ſo much cheriſhed in former times, to look upon no perſon as honourable, who was not a ſoldier. In his pleaſures, the late French king has been much cenſured; becauſe it generally happened that his miſtreſſes got the aſcendancy ſo far over him, as to occaſion ſeveral changes in the government, merely by their intrigues.

As great pains had been taken to give him a good education, he was even to the laſt a lover of learning and learned men. He had ſuch elevated notions of the neceſſity of a toleration in religious matters, that the power of the church of Rome has fallen into great contempt during his reign. Two reaſons, indeed, concurred towards preventing him from following his own inclinations in giving free liberty of conſcience to his proteſtant ſubjects. The firſt was, the inveterate prejudices of the vulgar nouriſhed by the clergy; and the ſecond, the wretched bigotry of his ſon the dauphin. In a word, Lewis XV. was one of the moſt brilliant ſovereigns that has appeared in Europe during the preſent century; and although ſome of his acts to his ſubjects were of a very arbitrary and oppreſſive nature, yet he was beloved by them. He has left his ſucceſſor a large fertile kingdom, with able miniſters to aſſiſt him; but the commerce of France is in a moſt wretched condition; nor does it appear that it will be otherwiſe, while they keep up ſuch a large ſtanding army.

We have, from time to time, in the courſe of this work, taken notice of the progreſs of learning in Britain; but the preſent age exceeds all others. The encouragement given to the fine arts by our ſovereign George III. has brought to light many new diſcoveries. An attempt has been made to diſcover a paſſage by the north pole; but the prodigious ſhoals and mountains of ice in thoſe ſeas rendered the ſcheme abortive; nor does it appear that ever it will be practicable, for if ſuch a paſſage would be attended with great danger, it is not worth the ſearching after.

In 1768, Mr. Banks, an ingenious young gentleman, and Dr. Solander, a native of Sweden, who had ſtudied under the great Lineus, undertook a voyage to the South Seas, under the protection of government. They traverſed ſeas and viſited iſlands almoſt unknown before, and although no beneficial conſequences have yet reſulted from their diſcoveries, there is no doubt but others will improve upon them. The ſame gentlemen have ſince made a voyage to the North Seas, and viſited Iceland, a place though belonging to the king of Denmark, yet but very little known.

His majeſty has added ſeveral new profeſſorſhips to ſome of the public univerſities; men of learning have had penſions ſettled upon them adequate to their merit. Upon the whole the age of George III. has been marked with ſome ſtriking events. More works of merit in the literary world have made their appearance than in any former reign, and the free acceſs that gentlemen have to the books and records in the Britiſh Muſeum has given hiſtory an additional luſtre, for nothing is now offered to the public without poſitive proofs. The literary world has ſuſtained a great loſs in the united deaths of lord Lyttleton, Dr. Goldſmith and Dr. Gregory; but it is to be hoped that the deficiency will be made up by ſome of the riſing generation; for as no minds are more ſuſceptible of impreſſions than thoſe of our youth, ſo no nation has ever produced greater men.
